PREFACE.

THE original design of this compendious work was, in some respects, different from the direction it took during the course of its publication. The Author intended, by a series of Essays, each comprised in a single Number, to have guarded the minds of young people especially against the infidelity and scepticism of modern times, as well as to give a distinct view of the grand peculiarities, and excellent tendency of genuine Christianity. He purposed not to be strictly methodical, argumentative, or systematic; but to treat a variety of subjects in a familiar, easy, and engaging manner. The attempt, however, soon convinced him, that he had not the requisite talents for Essays of this description; and that he must leave it to persons of a more versatile and happy genius, to furnish that species of publication which seems most suited to the present circumstances, and best adapted to the taste of modern readers.

As, however, the Essays first published met with great encouragement, and had considerable circulation, he proceeded on the plan to which he found himself most competent; and, without the least previous design, he at length completed, according to his views, a compendious system of the Christian religion.

Since the work was finished, in 1794, it has generally been disposed of in complete copies, though a large quantity of separate Essays has likewise been dispersed, and it is not without great reluctance that the plan of Numbers has been given up. Paper has proved a material impediment; while the small type and crowded page of the former edition have by many been complained of, not only as uncomfortable to the reader, but as a real hindrance to the usefulness of the work.

The improvements in the present edition will, it is hoped, be deemed fully adequate to the advance in the price. Great pains have been bestowed in correcting the inaccuracies of the style, in rendering perspicuous such passages, as had been left rather obscure from regard to brevity, in giving energy to some arguments which had not been stated in their full force, and in placing several illustrations to greater advantage. Peculiar care has likewise been taken to render the Scriptural references and quotations accurate; and further proof from the sacred oracles has frequently been adduced in support of the conclusions which had been formed: a correct Index for the conveniency of the reader has also been annexed.

The work thus revised, the Author commends to the candour of the public, from which it hath already met with a favourable reception; and he earnestly begs the prayers of all pious Christians, for the divine blessing on this attempt, and on all his other feeble endeavours to spread the knowledge of the blessed gospel of God our Saviour, and to excite and direct believers to adorn that holy doctrine by their whole conduct and conversation.

ESSAY I.

On the Divine Inspiration of the Holy Scriptures.

IT is manifest to all who seriously reflect on the powers and propensities of human nature, that we are formed capable of religion, and have an inward consciousness that we ought to worship some superior Being, on whom our safety and happiness depend: but at the same time, the state of the world, in all places where the Bible has not been known, unanswerably proves, that we are incapable of discovering for ourselves a religion, which is worthy of God, suited to our wants, and conducive to our true interest. The shortness of life also, and the reasonable persuasion that men in general entertain of a future state, concur to show that our grand concern lies in another world. Yet uncertainty and perplexity, nay, palpable error and absurdity, have ever incumbered men's reasonings and conjectures on these important subjects.—Even at Athens, Jehovah was “the unknown God.” (Acts xvii. 23.) And all beyond the grave was an unknown world.

The wisest of the Pagans, therefore, considered a revelation from the Deity to be exceedingly desirable, in order that bewildered mortals might learn the way, in which they could worship him with acceptance, and be happy; and some of them entertained hopes, that such an inestimable favour would at length be vouchsafed. Indeed confused expectations of this kind have been common in the world; as it is manifest from the reception that hath been given to pretended revelations, which otherwise could not have obtained credit and currency.

Various impositions, in this important concern, have been detected by careful investigation: and there is but one book in the world, which so much as appears to be a revelation from God. This has stood the test of ages, and undergone the most severe scrutiny; and the more it has been examined by serious inquirers, the fuller conviction have they obtained of its divine authority. No one now ventures forth as an avowed, sober, and manly adversary, to dispute its claim in the open field of fair argument: yet few in comparison are practically convinced, that it is the unerring word of God; and an increasing number of objectors perplex themselves and others, by discovering supposed inconsistencies, or unimportant difficulties; or by setting up their own reasonings and imaginations in opposition to its doctrines, and making that disagreement a ground of hesitation or rejection. So that scepticism, and a partial, frivolous, disingenuous, carping infidelity, have become exceedingly common; the minds of young persons especially are poisoned by them; great pains are taken to disseminate these cavils and objections, (though they have been solidly answered again and again;) and those persons are treated as weak enthusiasts, or irrational bigots, who simply believe the Scriptures as the sure testimony of God.

It may, therefore, be seasonable, to state with all possible brevity, some of the most conclusive reasons, by which reflecting men have been induced to submit to the authority of the Bible, and to believe that it is a revelation from the God of Truth. By the divine inspiration of the Holy Scriptures, I mean, such an immediate and complete discovery by the Holy Spirit to the minds of the sacred penmen, of those things which could not have been otherwise known; and such an effectual superintendency, as to those matters which they might be informed of by other means, as entirely to preserve them from error in every particular, which could in the least affect any of the doctrines or commandments contained in their writings. Every proposition, therefore, is to be considered as the sure testimony of God, in that sense, according to which the sacred penmen proposed it as truth. Thus facts occurred, and words were spoken, as to the import of them, and the instruction to be deduced from them, as they stand recorded; but we must judge of those facts, or discourses, by the doctrinal and preceptive parts of the Scriptures: nor does it at all invalidate the complete inspiration of the sacred writers, to allow that they expressed themselves in common language, and wrote of things as men generally spoke of them; rather than according to philosophical exactness, or in the style that was used in the schools of the learned, during the ages in which they lived. Supposed or unimportant errors, or inaccuracies of expressions, in such things, are not in the least inconsistent with that entire divine inspiration of which we speak; for the Scriptures were not written to render us exact philosophers, or to instruct us in ancient history and geography, but to make us wise unto salvation. Nor do the few immaterial mistakes, which in a long course of years have crept in, through the errors of transcribers, create any difficulty or uncertainty to the humble and teachable inquirer: though they frequently give occasion to the self-sufficient to cavil and object; for the "Lord taketh the wise in their own craftiness."

It is futile and absurd, for any man to dispute against particular doctrines as unreasonable, to disallow facts as incredible, or to quarrel with the divine dispensation as unrighteous; when he finds himself unable to answer the plain arguments, which are adduced to prove the whole to be the word of God. Where the premises are undeniable, and the deductions unavoidable, obstinacy and self-conceit alone will persist in incredulity; and ridicule, reviling, subtle insinuations, or witty sarcasms, are, in such a case, certain indications of a proud and bitter enmity to the truth itself. If then the arguments that shall be adduced, be sufficient to establish the divine authority of the Scripture; I trust the reader will recollect, that, as a reasonable and accountable creature, he is bound to study, believe, and obey it; and to make it the rule and standard of all his principles, affections, and conduct. These things premised, I observe—

I. That vast numbers of wise and good men, through many generations and in distant countries, have agreed in receiving the Bible as a divine revelation. Many of them have been noted for seriousness, erudition, penetration, and impartiality in judging of men and things. With much labour and patient investigation, they detected the impostures by which their cotemporaries were duped: yet the same assiduous examination confirmed them in believing the Bible to be the Word of God; and induced them to recommend it, living and dying, to all others, as the source of wisdom, hope, and consolation. In this view, even the tradition of the church has much weight: for, whatever abuse has been made of the term, by such as generally were no part of the true church; yet the whole company of those, who have worshipped the living God in spirit and truth, (including them who ventured and laid down their lives for conscience sake, and who were the most pious, holy, and useful men in every age,) having unanimously concurred in handing down to us the Scriptures as a divine revelation, and having very little differed about the books which form a part of that sacred deposit, must be allowed to be a consideration of great importance. And I cannot but suppose, that if a Being of entire impartiality, of sound mind, and holy disposition, should be shown the two companies, of those who have received, and of those who have rejected the Scriptures; and should compare the seriousness, learning, patient investigation of truth, solid judgment, holy lives, and composure in a dying hour, (without unmanly terror or indecent levity,) of the one company, with the character and the conduct of the other; he would be induced to take up the Bible with profound veneration, and the strongest prepossession in its favour.

II. The agreement of the sacred penmen among themselves is another cogent argument of their divine inspiration. Should an equal number of cotemporaries of the same country, education, habits, profession, natural disposition, and rank in life, concur in writing a book on religious subjects as large as the Bible, each furnishing his proportion without comparing notes together; the attentive reader, whose mind had been long inured to such studies, would be able to discover some diversity of opinion among them. But the penmen of the Scripture succeeded each other, during the term of fifteen hundred years: some of them were princes or priests, others shepherds and fishermen; their natural abilities, education, habits, and employments, were exceedingly dissimilar; they wrote laws, history, prophecy, odes, devotional exercises, proverbs, parables, doctrines, and controversy; and each man had his distinct department; yet they all exactly coincide in the exhibition they give us of the perfections, works, truths, and will of God; of the nature, situation, and obligations of man; of sin and salvation; of this world and the next; and in short of all things connected with our duty, safety, interest, and comfort; and in the whole of the religion inculcated by them. They all were evidently of the same judgment, aimed to establish the same principles, and applied them to the same practical purposes. Apparent inconsistencies will indeed perplex the superficial reader; but they will vanish after a more accurate investigation: nor could ever any charge of disagreement, among the penmen of the Bible, be substantiated: for it can only be said, that they related the same facts with different circumstances which are perfectly reconcileable; and that they gave instructions suited to the persons whom they addressed, without systematically showing the harmony of them with other parts of divine truth. They wrote not by concert, and bestowed no pains to avoid the appearance of inconsistency: yet the exact coincidence that is perceived among them by the diligent student, is most astonishing, and cannot be accounted for on any rational principles, without admitting that they wrote "as they were moved by the Holy Ghost."

To this we may add, that the scriptural history accords, in a wonderful manner, with the most authentic records which remain of the events, customs, and manners of the countries and ages to which it stands related. The rise and fall of empires, the revolutions that have taken place in the world, and the grand outlines of chronology, as mentioned or referred to in the Scriptures, are coincident with those stated by the most approved ancient writers: whilst the palpable errors in these respects, detected in the apocryphal books, constitute one of the most decisive reasons for rejecting them as spurious. The history of the Bible is of far greater antiquity than any other records extant in the world: and it is remarkable, that in numerous instances it shows the real origin of those absurd fables, which disgrace and obscure all other histories of those remote times: which is no feeble proof, that it was derived from some surer source of information than human tradition.

III. The miracles, by which the penmen of the Scriptures confirmed their divine mission to their cotemporaries, afford us also a most convincing proof in this matter. The account of these miracles may be evidently shown to have been published very soon after the time, and at the places, in which they were said to have been wrought in the most conspicuous manner, and before vast multitudes, enemies as well as friends: yet this public challenge never called forth any man to deny that they were really performed; nor was an attempt of this kind made till long afterwards. Can any man of common sense, think that Moses and Aaron could possibly have persuaded the whole nation of Israel, that they had witnessed all the plagues of Egypt, passed through the Red Sea with the waters piled on each side of them, gathered the manna every morning, and seen all the wonders recorded in their history; had no such events taken place? If then that generation could not be thus imposed on; when could the belief of these extraordinary transactions be palmed upon the nation? Surely, it would have been impossible in the next age, to persuade them that their fathers had seen and experienced such wonderful things, when they had never before heard a single word about them in all their lives: and when an appeal must have been made to them, that these were things well known among them! What credit could have been obtained to such a forgery at any subsequent period? It would have been absolutely necessary, in making this attempt, to persuade the people that such traditions had always been current among them; that the memory of them had for ages been perpetuated by days and ordinances observed by all the nation; and that their whole civil and religious establishment had thence originated: and could this have possibly been effected, if they all had known, that no such memorials and traditions had ever before been heard of among them? The same might be shown concerning the other miracles recorded in Scripture, especially those of Christ and his apostles: and it might be made evident that the man, who denies them to have been actually performed, must believe more wonderful things without any evidence, than those which he rejects, though established by unanswerable proof. But brevity will only allow me to insist on one miraculous event, viz. the resurrection of the Lord Jesus: for this being once proved, the substance of the whole Scripture is evinced to be a divine revelation. His doctrine and authority establish the authenticity of the Old Testament: and the witnesses of his resurrection were the penmen of the New Testament.

Almost all human affairs are conducted by testimony: the concurrence of two or three unexceptionable witnesses is sufficient to prove any fact, that is in its own nature credible: and the resurrection of a dead person, by Omnipotence, and for the most important purposes, cannot reasonably be deemed incredible. The ancient prophets had predicted the resurrection of the Messiah; (Ps. xvi. 10. Isaiah liii. 10—12.) and indeed every pre-intimation of his glorious and perpetual kingdom, when compared with the prophecies of his sufferings and death, implied that he would rise again from the dead. His very enemies knew, that he had foretold his own resurrection within three days, and they took precautions accordingly: yet the body was gone, and they could give no rational account what was become of it. They had the whole authority vested in them, and their reputation was deeply concerned : yet they rather chose to bear the open charge of the basest murder and prevarication imaginable, than excite any further inquiry, by bringing either the soldiers who guarded the sepulchre, or the disciples who were said to have stolen the body, to a public trial ; though they had the latter in their custody. The eleven apostles, (to whom a twelfth was soon added,) were a sufficient number of competent witnesses : being men of plain sense and blameless lives, they could not but identify the person of their Master, whom they had so long attended ; they unanimously testified, that they had received the fullest assurance of their senses to his resurrection, and at length beheld him ascend up towards heaven, till he was received out of their sight ; and they persisted invariably in this testimony for many years. They were evidently intimidated to a great degree by the crucifixion of their Lord, and backward to credit his resurrection ; and they could have no possible secular motives, to invent and propagate such a report : for ignominy, torture, and death must be the probable consequences of espousing the cause of one, who had been crucified as a deceiver. In all other things, they appeared simple, upright, holy men ; yet, if in this they deceived, the world never yet produced such a company of artful and wicked impostors : though it is evident, they could propose no secular advantage to themselves from their deep laid and well conducted schemes ! For they spent all the rest of their lives in promoting the religion of Jesus, renouncing every earthly interest, facing all kinds of opposition and persecution, bearing contempt and ignominy, prepared habitually to seal their testimony with their blood ; and most of them actually dying martyrs in the cause, recommending it with their latest breath as worthy of universal acceptance. It is likewise observable, that when they went forth to preach Christ as risen from the dead, they were manifestly changed, in almost every respect, from what they had before been : their timidity gave place to the most undaunted courage, their carnal prejudices vanished, their ambitious contests ceased, their narrow views were immensely expanded; and zeal for the honour of their Lord, with love to the souls of men, seems to have engrossed and elevated all the powers of their minds. There were also many other competent witnesses to this great event, even to the number of 500: these too concurred in the same testimony to the end of their lives; and neither fear, hope, or dissension among themselves, induced so much as one of them to vary from the testimony of the rest: nay, the very apostates from christianity, however malignant, never openly charged the apostles with any imposition in this respect. A more complete human testimony to any event cannot even be imagined: for if our Lord had shown himself, "openly to all the people" of the Jews, and their rulers had persisted in rejecting him; it would have rather weakened than confirmed the evidence; and if they had unanimously received him as the Messiah, it might have excited in others a suspicion, that it was a plan concerted for aggrandizing the nation.

But God himself was also pleased to add his own testimony to that of his servants; conferring on them the gift of the Holy Ghost, and enabling them to impart the same miraculous powers to others, by the laying on of their hands. Thus the number of witnesses continually increased, the testimony was more widely diffused, and no enemy could deny that they, who attested Christ's resurrection, performed most stupendous miracles, (Acts iv. 13—16.) In consequence of this, the unlettered, unarmed, and despised preachers of a crucified and risen Saviour, prevailed against all the combined power, learning, wealth, superstition, and wickedness of the world, till Christianity was completely established upon the ruins of Judaism and Pagan idolatry!—Here again, it may be demanded, when could the belief of such facts have been obtruded on mankind, if they had never happened? Surely not in the age when they were said to have been witnessed by tens of thousands, who were publicly challenged to deny them if they could! not in any subsequent age; for the origin of Christianity was ascribed to them, and millions must have been persuaded, that they had always believed those things, which they had never to that time so much as heard of! We may then venture to assert, that no past event was ever so fully proved as our Lord's resurrection; and that it would not be half so preposterous to doubt, whether such a man as Julius Cæsar ever existed, as it would be to question, whether Jesus actually arose from the dead—What then do they mean, who oppose some little apparent variations, in the account given of this event by the four Evangelists, (which have repeatedly been shown capable of an easy reconciliation;) to such an unparalleled complication of evidence that it did actually take place?

IV. The prophecies contained in the sacred Scriptures, and fulfilling to this day, prove them to be divinely inspired. These form a species of perpetual miracles, which challenge the investigation of men in every age; and which, though overlooked by the careless and prejudiced, cannot fail of producing conviction proportioned to the attention paid to them. The prophecies of the Messiah, which are found in almost all the books of the Old Testament, when compared with the exact accomplishment of them, as recorded in the authentic writings of the Evangelists, abundantly prove them to have been penned under the guidance of the Holy Spirit: whilst the existence of the Jews, as a people differing from all others upon the face of the earth, and their regard to these writings as the sacred oracles handed down from their progenitors, sufficiently vouch for their antiquity: though further proof in abundance is at hand, did brevity allow me to insist upon it. According to the predictions of these books, Nineveh hath been desolated*; Babylon swept with the besom of destruction†; Tyre become a place to dry nets in‡; Egypt the basest of the kingdoms, &c. § These and many other events, fulfilling ancient prophecies so many ages after they were delivered, can never be accounted for ; except by allowing, that He, who sees the end from the beginning, thus revealed his secret purposes, that the accomplishment of them might prove the Scriptures to be his word of instruction to mankind.

In like manner, there are evident predictions interwoven with the writings of almost every penman of the New Testament, as a divine attestation to their doctrine. The destruction of Jerusalem, with all the circumstances predicted in the Evangelists, (an account of which may be seen in Josephus's History of the Jewish wars ; ) the series of ages, during which that city hath been " trodden under foot of the gentiles ; " the long continued dispersion of the Jews, and the conversion of the nations to Christianity ; the many antichristian corruptions of the goſpel ; the superstition, uncommanded austerities, idolatry, tyranny, and persecution of the Roman hierarchy ; the division of the empire into ten kingdoms ; their concurrence during many ages to support the usurpations of the church of Rome ; and the existence of Christianity to this day, amidst so many enemies, who have used every possible method to destroy it ; when diligently compared with the predictions of the New Testament, do not come short of the fullest demonstration which the case will admit of, that the books, which contain them are the unerring word of God.

V. Only the Scriptures, (and such books as make them their basis,) introduce the infinite God speaking in a manner worthy of himself, with simplicity, majesty, and authority. His character, as there delineated, comprises all possible excellence without any intermixture ; his laws and ordinances accord to his perfections ; his works and dispensations exhibit them ; and all his dealings with his creatures bear the stamp of infinite wisdom, power, justice, purity, truth, goodness, and mercy, harmoniously displayed. The description there given of the state of the world, and of human nature, widely differs from our ideas of them ; yet facts unanswerably prove it to be exactly true. The records of every nation, the events of every age, and the history of every individual, confute men's self-flattery in this respect ; and prove that the penmen of the Bible knew the human character better, than any philosopher, ancient or modern, ever did. Their account teaches us what men are about, and what may be expected from them : whilst all who form a different estimate of human nature find their principles inapplicable to facts, their theories incapable of being reduced to practice, and their expectations strangely disappointed. The Bible, well understood, enables us to account for those events, which have appeared inexplicable to men in every age : and the more carefully any one watches and scrutinizes all the motives, intentions, imaginations, and desires of his own heart for a length of time ; the clearer will it appear to him, that the penmen of the Scriptures give a far more just account of his disposition and character, than he could have done himself. In short, man is such a being, and the world is in such a state, as they have described : yet multiplied facts, constant observation, and reiterated experience, are insufficient to convince us of it, till we first learn it from the Bible ; and then comparing all that passes within and around us, with what we there read, we become more and more acquainted with our own hearts, and established in the belief of its divine original.

The mysteries contained in Scripture rather confirm than invalidate this conclusion ; for a pretended revelation without mystery would confute itself. Incomprehensibility is inseparable from God, and from all his works, even the most inconsiderable, as the growth of a blade of grass. The mysteries of the Scriptures are sublime, interesting, and useful ; they display the divine perfections, lay a foundation for our hope, and inculcate humility, reverence, love, and gratitude. What is incomprehensible must be mysterious : but it may be intelligible as far as revealed ; and though it connect with things above our reason, it may imply nothing contrary to it. So that, in all respects, the contents of the Bible are suited to convince the serious inquirer, that it is the word of God.

VI. The tendency of the Scripture constitutes another unanswerable proof. Did all men believe and obey the Bible as a divine revelation, to what conduct would it lead them? and what would be the effect on society? Surely repentance, and renunciation of all vice and immorality, when connected with the spiritual worship of God in his ordinances, faith in his mercy and truth through the mediation of his Son, and all the fruits of the Holy Spirit, as visible in the life of every true believer, would form such characters, and produce such effects, as the world hath never yet witnessed. Men would then universally do justice, speak truth, show mercy, exercise mutual forgiveness, follow after peace, bridle their appetites and passions, and lead sober, righteous, and godly lives. Murders, wars, bitter contentions, cruel oppressions, and unrestrained licentiousness, would no more desolate the world, and fill it with misery: but righteousness, goodness, and truth, would bless the earth with a felicity exceeding all our present conceptions. This is, no doubt, the direct tendency of the Scriptural doctrines, precepts, motives, and promises: nothing is wanting to remedy the state of the world, and to fit men for the worship and felicity of heaven, but that they should believe and obey the Scriptures. And if many enormous crimes have been committed under colour of zeal for Christianity; it only proves the depravity of man's heart: for the Scripture, soberly understood, most expressly forbids such practices; and men do not act thus, because they duly regard it, but because they will not believe and obey it.

The tendency of these principles is exhibited in the characters there delineated: whilst the consistency between the doctrines and precepts of Scripture, and the actions of men recorded in it, implies another argument of its divine original. Ungodly men are characterized, and their actions are recited, according to the abstract account given of human nature, and believers are represented as conducting themselves exactly in that manner, which the principles of the Bible might have led us to expect. They had like passions with other men; but they were habitually restrained and regulated by the fear and love of God, and by other holy affections. Their general conduct was good, but not perfect; and sometimes their natural proneness to evil broke out, and made way for bitter repentance and deeper humiliation: so that they appear constantly to have perceived their need of forgiveness and divine assistance; to have expected their felicity from the rich mercy of God; and, instead of abusing that consideration, to have thence deduced motives for gratitude, zeal, patience, meekness, and love to mankind.

But one character is exhibited, in the simplest and most unaffected manner, which is perfection itself. Philosophers, Orators, and Poets, in their several ways, have bestowed immense pains to describe the character of some man, in such a manner that no fault could be found in it: and they have given us complete models of their own estimate of excellence, and sufficient proof that they laboured the point to the utmost of their ability. But the four evangelists, whose divine inspiration is now frequently doubted on the most frivolous pretences, without seeming to think of it, have done that which all other writers have failed in. They have shown us a perfect human character, by recording facts, without making any comment on them, or showing the least ingenuity in the arrangement of them. 'They have given the history of one, whose spirit, words, and actions, were in every particular what they ought to have been! who always did the very thing which was proper, and in the best manner imaginable! who never once deviated from the most consummate wisdom, purity, benevolence, compassion, meekness, humility, fortitude, patience, piety, zeal, or any other excellency! and who in no instance let one virtue or holy disposition entrench on another, but exercised them all in entire harmony, and exact proportion!'—'This subject challenges investigation, and sets infidelity at defiance! Either these four men exceeded, in genius and capacity, all other writers that ever lived; or they wrote under the guidance of divine inspiration: for without labour or affection they have performed what hath baffled all others, who have set themselves purposely to establish it*.' This is a fact which cannot be denied: no perfect character is elsewhere delineated, and probably no mere man could have drawn one; no person would have thought of such a character as that of Jesus; yet no flaw or fault can be found in it: this alone I apprehend, and their entire consistency in this respect with each other, demonstrates that the evangelists wrote under the guidance of the Holy spirit.

It hath often been observed, that Satan would never have influenced men to write the Bible; for then he would have been divided against himself: wicked men would not have penned a book, which so awfully condemned their whole conduct: and good men would never have ascribed their own investigations to divine inspiration; especially as such forgeries are most severely reprobated in every part of it. But indeed, it is a work as much exceeding every effort of mere men, as the Sun surpasses those scanty illuminations, by which his splendour is imitated, or his absence supplied.

VII. The actual effects, produced by the Scriptures, evince their divine original. These are indeed far from being equal to their tendency; because, through human depravity, the gospel is not generally believed and obeyed: yet they are very considerable; and we may assert that even at present there are many thousands, who have been reclaimed from profane and immoral courses to sobriety, equity, truth, and piety, and to a good behaviour in relative life, by attending to the sacred Scriptures. Having been "made free from sin, and become the servants of God, they have their fruit unto holiness;" and after "patiently continuing in well doing," and cheerfully bearing various afflictions, they joyfully meet death, being supported by the hope of eternal life "as the gift of God through Jesus Christ:" whilst they, who best know them, are most convinced, that they have been rendered wiser, holier, and happier, by believing the Bible ; and that there is a reality in religion, though various instances and passions may keep them from duly embracing it. There are indeed enthusiasts also ; but they become such by forsaking the old rule of faith and duty, for some new fancy : and there are hypocrites ; but they attest the reality and excellency of religion, by deeming it worth their while to counterfeit it.

VIII. Brevity is so connected with fulness in the Scriptures, that they are a treasure of divine knowledge which can never be exhausted. The things, that are absolutely necessary to salvation, are few, simple, and obvious to the meanest capacity, provided it be attended by an humble teachable disposition : but the most learned, acute, and diligent student cannot in the longest life obtain an entire knowledge of this one volume. The deeper he works the mine, the richer and more abundant he finds the ore ; new light continually beams from this source of heavenly knowledge, to direct his conduct, and illustrate the works of God, and the ways of men ; and he will at last leave the world confessing, that the more he studied the Scriptures, the fuller conviction he had of his own ignorance and of their inestimable value.

IX. Lastly, “ He that believeth hath the witness in himself.” The discoveries which he hath made by the light of the Scripture ; the experience he hath had, that the Lord fulfils its promises to those who trust in them ; the abiding effects produced by attending to it, on his judgment, dispositions, and affections ; and the earnestness of heaven enjoyed by him in communion with God, put the matter beyond all doubt : and though many believers are not qualified to dispute against infidels, they are enabled, through this inward testimony, to obey, and suffer for, the gospel ; and they can no more be convinced by reasonings and objections, that men invented the Bible, than they can be persuaded, that men created the Sun, whose light they behold, and by whose beams they are cheered.

And now, if an objector could fully invalidate one half or two thirds, of these arguments, (to which many more might be easily added,) the remainder would be abundantly sufficient—Nay, perhaps, any one of them so far decides the question, that were there no other proof of the Bible's being the word of God, a man could not reject it, without acting in opposition to those dictates of common sense, which direct his conduct in his secular affairs—But in reality, I have a confidence that not one of these proofs can be fairly answered; at least it has never yet been done: and the combined force of the whole is so great, that the objections, by which men cavil against the truth, only resemble the foaming waves dashing against the deep rooted rock, which hath for ages defied their unavailing fury. But though these can effect nothing more, they may beat off the poor shipwrecked mariner, who was about to ascend it, in hopes of deliverance from impending destruction.

The consequences of our present conduct, according to the Scriptures, are so vast, that if there were only a bare possibility of their truth, it would be madness to run the risk of rejecting them, for the sake of gaining the whole world: What then is it, when we have such unanswerable demonstrations that they are the word of God, and cannot reasonably doubt of it for a moment, to disobey the commands and neglect the salvation revealed in it, for the veriest trifle that can be proposed to us! Especially, as it may be shown that, (besides the eternal consequences,) the firm belief of the Scriptures, and that conscientious obedience which true faith always produces, will render a man happier in this present life, even amidst trials and self denying services, than any other man can be made, by all the pomp, pleasure, wealth, power, and honour, which the world can bestow on him!

ESSAY II.

On the Importance of Revealed Truth, the Duty of reading the Scriptures, and the Manner in which it should be performed.

AS the Bible may be unanswerably proved to be the word of God, we should reason from it, as from self-evident principles, or demonstrated truths: for “His Testimony is sure, and giveth wisdom to the simple.”

Many parts of Scripture accord so well with the conclusions of our rational powers, when duly exercised, that either they might have been known without Revelation, or else men have mistaken the capacity of perceiving truth for that of discovering it. Hence various controversies have arisen about natural religion, which many suppose to be rather taken for granted, than made known, by Revelation. But the term is ambiguous: for the word natural includes the propensities of our hearts, as well as the power of our understandings; and the same truths which accord to the latter, are often totally opposite to the former. The gentiles might have known many things concerning God and his will, if they had “liked to retain him in their knowledge;” but their alienation of heart from him prevailed to keep them in ignorance, or entangle them in error. So that the religion of reason would express the idea much more intelligibly, if any such distinction be deemed necessary.

This, however, is obvious, that many truths and precepts which are found in the Bible, have been maintained by persons who were ignorant of, or rejected, that divine revelation. or who chose not to own their obligations to it: and many others, professing to receive the Scriptures as the word of God, assent to some truths contained in them, not so much because they are revealed, as because they think that they may be proved by other arguments ; whereas, they reject, neglect, or explain away, those doctrines, which are not thus evident to their reason, or level with their capacities. So that at last it comes to this, that they discard all that is deemed peculiar to revelation ; and refuse to believe the testimony of God, if their own reason will not vouch for the truth of what he says.

It may indeed be questioned, whether those opinions, which men so confidently magnify as the oracles of reason, were not originally without exception borrowed from revelation, as far as there is any truth in them : and it is evident, that they cannot possess sufficient certainty, clearness, and authority, to render them efficacious principles of action, except as they are enforced by revelation, and its awful sanctions. And the wildest enthusiast never dreamed of a grosser absurdity, than they maintain, who suppose that the only wise God hath given a revelation to man, confirmed by miracles and prophecies, and established in the world by the labours and sufferings of his servants, and the crucifixion of his well-beloved Son ; and that this revelation at last is found to contain nothing, but what we might have known as well without it ! Nay, that it is expressed in such language, as hath given occasion to those, who have most implicitly believed and reverentially obeyed it, to maintain sentiments, and adopt practices, erroneous and evil in themselves, and of fatal consequence to mankind.

We might, therefore, have previously expected that a revelation from God should illustrate, confirm, and enforce such things, as seem more level to our natural powers : and that it should make known to us many important matters, which we could not have otherwise discovered ; and which would be found exceedingly different from all our notions and imaginations ; seeing that our contracted views and limited capacities are infinitely distant from the omniscience of God. So that it is most reasonable to conclude, that the doctrinal truths, which more immediately relate to the divine nature, perfections, providence, and government, the invisible and eternal world, and the mysteries of redemption, constitute by far the most important part of revelation ; as discovering to us such things “ as eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have they entered into the heart of man ;” and yet they are essentially connected with our present hope, worship, and duty, and with our future happiness or misery.

He therefore cannot, according to the common use of language, be called a believer, who only holds those doctrines, which he deems the dictates of reason as well as of revelation ; whilst he rejects the testimony of God, whenever he deems it unreasonable. And we may hence learn what judgment to form of those who affirm, without hesitation, that the moral precepts and sanctions, with the more evident truths of the Bible, are the only important part of it ; that it is of little consequence what men believe, especially concerning those things which are in any degree mysterious ; and that none but narrow bigots, and weak and ignorant people, lay any stress upon speculative opinions “ He that believeth not, maketh God a liar ;” especially he that believeth not the testimony which God hath given of his Son, and of eternal life bestowed on sinners through him : (John iii 12—21. 31—36. 1 John v. 9—12.) : this is the uniform doctrine of Scripture ; and to contradict it is equivalent to a total rejection of divine revelation. Can it be supposed that the prophets and apostles were commissioned, and that the Son of God was manifested in the flesh, died on the cross, and rose from the dead, merely to inform mankind that the Lord approved honesty, temperance, truth, and kindness, and disapproved the contrary vices ? Or that the unnumbered testimonies which the scriptures contain, to the mysteries of the Divine nature, the Person of the Redeemer, the work of Redemption, and the influences of the Holy Spirit, may, without criminality, be disbelieved, derided, or reviled ; provided men are moral in their conduct towards one another ? Or that God is equally pleased with those who thus affront his veracity, as with them who implicitly submit to his teaching and credit his testimony ? If this be the case, in what does the difference between the infidel and the believer consist? All, except avowed atheists, will allow the propriety of many precepts, and the truth of some doctrines, coinciding with those contained in Scripture: but the infidel admits them as the dictates of reason, not as the testimony of God; and the pretended believer rejects all, without hesitation, that appears not to accord with the same standard. So that both of them believe their own reasonings, "lean to their own understandings," and "make God a liar," when his testimony contradicts their own self-confident decisions! It appears, therefore, that the prevailing notion of the comparatively small importance of doctrinal truth, is subversive of revelation; and, in fact, is only a more plausible and more dangerous species of infidelity.

If we believe the Scriptures to have been written by inspiration from God, and have any suitable apprehensions of his omniscience, veracity, and perfections; we must be convinced, that it is the height of arrogance for us shortsighted erring creatures of yesterday, to speak of any doctrine contained in them, as false or doubtful, because it is not coincident with our reasonings or conceptions. Surely, a small portion of modesty and humility might suffice to induce a confession, that we are more likely to be mistaken than the only wise God! In rejecting his authenticated testimony, we must either advance our knowledge above his omniscience, impeach his veracity, or deny the Scriptures altogether or in part to be his word; reserving to ourselves the infallible determination, what part is of divine authority, and what is not! If, on the other hand, we deem any part of the Scriptures, though true, to be of little or no importance, or of bad tendency, what do we, but affront the infinite wisdom or goodness of God, as if He did not know what truths were proper to be revealed to man; or as if he purposely discovered those matters, which would have been better for mankind never to have known? And seeing it is evident that the Lord hath, in the Scriptures, required the belief of certain doctrines as absolutely necessary to salvation; to insinuate that these doctrines are either false, doubtful, or of no value, must involve in it the grossest and most affronting blasphemy imaginable.

We do not indeed maintain that all the truths of revelation are of equal importance ; because they are not stated in Scripture to be so ; but none can be wholly unimportant, and we are not always competent to decide upon their comparative value. Some things are more obvious than others ; and such as are more hard to be understood, are not so well adapted to those persons “ who are unstable and unlearned ” in the school of Christ : yet we are not authorized to reject, or even to doubt, any of them. We may indeed demur as to the true interpretation of them, whilst in humble reverent teachableness, we wait for clearer light upon the subject : and we must remain for some time in partial ignorance or error, because we cannot at once become acquainted with all the truths which are revealed to faith, even when we have got a disposition implicitly to believe them. There are some things which relate to the very life and essence of religion ; others are rather necessary to our stability, comfort, and holy conduct ; these we must by no means reject, or treat with indifference ; but it is possible, that to the last, we may be mistaken or ignorant about some of them, and yet be found among the heirs of salvation.

The importance of revealed truth may be shown in another way ; for it is the seed or principle in the soul, whence all inward and real holiness proceeds. “ Sanctify “ them by thy truth, thy word is truth : ” (John xvii. 17—19 ;) “ beholding as in a glass,” (namely, in the doctrine of Christ,) “ the glory of the Lord, we are changed into “ the same image.” (2 Cor. iii. 18. iv. 3—6.) “ Without controversy great is the mystery of Godliness, God was manifest in the flesh.” This doctrine was, in the judgment of the apostle, “ the great mystery {of Godliness ;” and indeed all holy dispositions and affections towards God, all the genuine spiritual worship, all the willing obedience of filial love, and all the cheerful acquiescence in the divine will, and affiance on the divine truth and mercy, which have been found in the world since the fall of man, have arisen from a proper perception of this great truth, and the doctrines connected with it. Spirituality, (or delight in and supreme valuation of the holy excellence of spiritual things, and a disposition to seek pleasure and satisfaction in religion,) is intimately connected with a believing dependence on the promised influences of the Holy Spirit: and that view of the worth of the soul, the evil of sin, the justice and mercy of God, the vanity of the world, and the believer's obligations to a Saviour "who loved him, and redeemed him to God with his blood," which the doctrine of the cross communicates, is fundamental to deep repentance in genuine humility, gratitude, patience, meekness, forgiveness of injuries, love of enemies, and other parts of the Christian temper and character. Without this, a proud morality, and pharisaical task and form of godliness, will comprise the sum total of man's religion; except as he is brought under those impressions and leadings, which will in time influence him to embrace "the truth as it is in Jesus." This will appear more fully, and be proved more at large in the subsequent essays. The importance of revealed truth, therefore, may be evidently perceived, both from the authority of Him who speaks to us in the Scripture; the various methods he has taken to confirm the words of his servants; and the tendency and efficacy of sound doctrine to produce spiritual affections and holy obedience.

Indeed, the doctrines of Scripture may be received by a dead faith into the understanding as true, whilst the heart does not embrace them as good; and then they will "be held in unrighteousness." But a real and living belief of them is the proper root of true holiness. By regeneration the heart is prepared for thus receiving the truth, which then becomes the principle of progressive sanctification: "a whited sepulchre" is the emblem of all that can be attained to, where this is proudly rejected or treated with indifference: and every man's spirituality, piety, humility, and enlarged, disinterested, unostentatious philanthropy, will bear proportion to the degree in which he knows and cordially embraces the great doctrines of the Bible.

It must, therefore, be evident, that every person to whom the Scriptures are sent, ought to study them, and get acquainted with their contents. For if God, in compassion to our ignorance and love to our souls, as well as in regard to the honour of his own name and government, hath given us a book, penned under the inspiration of his Holy Spirit; and if the truths revealed in it be of the greatest importance: it must be most reasonable, that we should bestow pains to acquire the knowledge of them. Whether we consider the Scriptures, as a revelation which the Lord hath made to us of himself, that we may know, worship, and glorify him; or of his law and government, that we may submit to and obey him, and learn our true condition as sinners; or of his mercy and salvation, that we may find acceptance with him; or of the privileges of his children, in this life and that which is to come: in every view of the subject, the duty of searching them must be manifest. Nor can we neglect it, without avowing that we despise the knowledge of God and heavenly things; that we do not desire to serve our Creator; that we neither value his favour nor fear his frown; or that we can discover the way of peace and happiness without instruction. Nothing, therefore, can be more expressive of our ingratitude, rebellion, and alienation from God, than the general neglect of the Bible, which prevails among those that profess to believe it to be his word.

Does He then speak from heaven to us sinners about the way of eternal salvation, and shall we refuse to hear his gracious words? Does He give us a book, to guide us to happiness in this world, and for ever, and shall we not study it? Does he make known to us mortals those glories which angels adore with unceasing rapture, and shall we turn away with contemptuous aversion? Hath he provided for us sinners such a redemption, as sinless "angels desire to look into," and shall we think "the subject unworthy of notice?" Who can pretend to justify this conduct? Yet how much more pains do lawyers, physicians, and other students, who desire to excel in their professions, bestow in poring over voluminous authors, than men called Christians do in searching the Scriptures! Yea, how many give a decided preference to amusing and ingenious trifles, or political discussions, (not to say publications suited to corrupt their principles and morals,) above the sacred word of God! They would be ashamed not to have read some admired or popular author, though the work perhaps be wholly useless, (if not worse;) yet they remain, year after year, unacquainted with the Holy Scriptures! "Surely in vain is the word of the Lord given to them; " the pen of the scribes is in vain *."

It cannot be necessary, in such a compendious essay, to show particularly, how the study of the Scriptures is inculcated in every part of the sacred volume. Let the more attentive reader turn to what Moses spake to Israel †, what the Psalmist teaches ‡, and Solomon §, and what is contained in many passages of the New Testament ||. Indeed the apostles and evangelists always reasoned from, and appealed to, the Scriptures of the Old Testament, and supposed the Jews to be acquainted with them; and the penmen of the New assure us, "those things were written, " that we might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of " God; and that believing we might have life through his " name?" (John xx. 31.)

The case then is plain, that our obligation to search the Scriptures is indispensable; and that it is a duty of the greatest importance. Every person who allows them to be the infallible word of God, must be convicted in his own conscience of acting in an unreasonable and criminal manner, if he do not diligently study them; and the general neglect of men in this great concern, manifestly proves them not to be fully satisfied that the Bible was given by inspiration from God, and that it reveals the only way of peace and salvation. We do not urge men to believe without evidence : but we call upon them humbly and seriously to examine the proofs afforded them that the Scriptures are the word of God ; and then to bestow pains to learn the religion contained in them, and to compare the doctrine we propose, with that unerring standard from which we profess to have learned it. Nor can we doubt, but they who will not comply with such requisitions, will be left without excuse at the day of final retribution, whatever excuses or pretences they may make at present. It may therefore be useful to give a few directions to those who are convinced of their duty in this particular ; and desire to attend to it with profit to themselves, or those placed under their care.

I. Examine the whole of the Sacred Scriptures. I do not mean, that the same degree of attention and time should be employed about every part of the Bible : some things are but more remotely useful to us ; some are easily understood and applied ; others require more close and frequent investigation ; whilst the obscurity of some passages (especially to unlearned readers,) renders them less adapted to edification. Yet every part of the sacred oracles has its use, and throws light upon the rest : and as preachers very properly make their appeal to the Scriptures in support of their doctrines ; so the hearers cannot well judge how far their arguments are conclusive, unless they have a competent acquaintance with the whole of them. Nor is the Bible so large a book, but that even they who have not much leisure, may, in process of time, get a general knowledge of it in every part ; if they bestow a measure of diligence proportioned to the value of the acquisition : and as “ all Scripture is given by inspiration from God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness ; that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works ;” so every word demands a measure of our attention. It is, therefore, a very great hindrance to edification, when scrip-

ous persons rest satisfied with text-books, and abstracts from Scripture, or with a few favourite passages that are continually resorted to, whilst the rest of God's word is little regarded; and above all those parts are neglected, which teach men the particulars of the Christian temper; and of those duties in which they are most deficient.

It hath been found very useful by many, to divide the Bible into two or three parts, and to read a portion from each of them in order, in the morning, at noon, and in the evening, as people have leisure and opportunity: allowing a larger measure of time to the New Testament, or devotional parts of the Old; and reading these wholly, or principally, on the Lord's day, or other seasons set apart for religion. This in a few years, will bring a man familiarly acquainted with the whole Scriptures. And though singing the praises of God very properly forms a part of family worship, where both can be attended to; yet reading the Scriptures in course, (with a few exceptions, at the discretion of him who officiates,) seems a most valuable method of preparing the minds of children and servants for profiting by public instruction, as well as for giving them a comprehensive view of our holy religion.

It is also very advantageous to ministers, and others who have much leisure, to vary their method of reading: at some times going through a larger portion, with a more general regard to the scope of the sacred writer; at others minutely examining every word and sentence in a smaller portion, its connexion with the context, and its coincidence with other Scriptures; and to mark well the harmony and mutual subserviency of every part of divine truth; the proportion of one part to another; the distinct parts of which the whole consists; and the way in which the several subjects are stated, handled, arranged, and expressed.

II. Search the Scriptures daily. Divine truth is the food of the soul, which wants its nourishment as often as the body does. That day must have been mispent, in which no part of the Scriptures has been read or meditated on: we should therefore redeem time from indolence, recreation, useless visits, trifling conversation, and inordinate attention to secular affairs, for this employment : and then no lawful business would prevent any one from finding a little leisure, morning and evening at least, for reading some portion of the Scriptures ; which would furnish the mind with subjects for meditation when not necessarily engrossed about other matters, to the exclusion of vain thoughts and polluting imaginations. The more habitual this practice becomes, the greater pleasure will it afford ; and even the old Christian will not think that his knowledge renders it superfluous, or seek an excuse for omitting it ; but will apply to it, as a healthful person craves and relishes his food. I would especially enforce it upon the consciences of the young, not to let any day begin or end, without reading carefully a portion of Scripture : this will become in a short time a most useful habit ; and if they be abridged of a little sleep by this means, their bodies will not be injured, and their minds will be improved by it. It may also be observed, that hearing sermons, reading religious books, or joining in pious discourse, will often mislead, and seldom profit, those who do not compare the whole with the sacred Scriptures, by “ daily searching them, to know whether things are so or no.”

III. Read the Bible with the express purpose of appropriating the information communicated by it from God to man. When we have humbly and attentively considered and ascertained the meaning of any proposition ; we should implicitly believe it, how contrary soever it may be to our former opinion, or that of others in reputation for wisdom. We ought to reverence the authority, omniscience, veracity, and faithfulness of the Lord, who speaks to us in his word ; not doubting the truth or importance of any of his instructions, but studying the meaning of them in docility and patience. Thus imbibing wisdom and knowledge from their source, through the appointed medium, we shall grow more learned in divine things, than any teachers or aged students who lean to their own understandings : (Ps. cxix. 98—100.) even as the bosom friend of the prince, who learns his secrets from his own lips, will know more of his designs, than any conjectural politicians can do; though their sagacity and abilities be far superior to his.

IV. Use helps in searching the Scriptures, but not depend on them. The labours of those pious men who have spent their lives in studying and elucidating the sacred oracles, may be very profitable to those who either have less leisure or ability, or who are newly engaged in such researches, as an experienced guide may be to those who are strangers to the road; and it savours greatly of self-sufficiency to undervalue either commentators, or other writers on divine things. Yet all men are fallible, and we should call no man teacher upon earth: it must therefore, be proper to compare all their elucidations, or inferences, with the Scriptures themselves. Above all it behooves us, "to ask wisdom of God;" and to beg of him to give us the Holy Spirit, to remove from our minds every prejudice and carnal affection, and whatever may close them against any part of revealed truth, or indispose them to receive the illumination of heaven, (as the vitiated eye cannot make a proper use of the light of the Sun.) He alone who inspired the Scriptures, can help us to understand them: and if we search them, in dependence on, and prayer for his teaching, He will lead us into all truth, as far as our safety, peace, and duty require it.—It may be proper here to caution the reader against fanciful interpretations, which surprise and amuse, but mislead men from the practical meaning of Scripture; and against those who pretend to modernize divine truth; not choosing to "speak according to the oracles of God," but as they suppose the apostles would have done, if they had possessed the advantage of modern improvements: a supposition just as wise, as to attempt improving the light of the Sun by astronomy! In short, every text has its proper meaning as it stands related to the context; and its proper application to us: these we should seriously investigate, with fervent prayer for divine teaching; without presuming to add to, alter, or deduct from the revealed will of God, (Deut. xxix. 29.)

Lastly, we should search the Scriptures as the navigator consults his chart, and makes his observations; that he may discover where he is, and what course he must steer; or as any one looks into a glass, that he may both know what manner of man he is, and learn to adjust what is unbecoming; or as an heir reads his Father's will, and the inventory of his effects and estates, that he may know what the inheritance is, and the nature of the tenure by which he must possess it. We should accompany our reading with impartial self-examination; both in respect of our knowledge, judgment, dispositions, motives, affections, words, and actions, in every particular, at present, and in times past; that we may learn the state and want of our souls; and with self-application, as the persons spoken to, in every instruction, precept, sanction, counsel, warning, invitation or promise, according to our state, character, conduct, and circumstances; pausing to inquire, whether we have understood what we have read, and what we have learned from it; that beseeching the Lord to pardon what is past, and to help us for the future, we may, without delay or reserve, begin to practise what we know, waiting for further light in such matters as still continue doubtful or obscure to us — It would be easy to multiply directions, but the Scriptures thus studied, are “able to make us wise unto salvation, by faith in Jesus Christ.”

ESSAY III.

On the Scriptural Character of God.

EVERY attentive and intelligent student of the Bible will perceive, that revelation was vouchsafed to man, in order to deliver or preserve him from idolatry, by instructing him in the character and perfections of the one living and true God, and the way in which He would be worshipped; as well as to teach other duties, and to influence him to perform them. The jealous care of Jehovah to distinguish between himself and every idol, and to secure the glory to himself without allowing any of it to be given to another ; with the terrible denunciations pronounced against idolaters, and the severe judgments executed upon them, must attract the notice of all who are conversant with the sacred oracles, and convince every impartial person, that idolatry is the greatest of all sins, atheism alone excepted.

Yet in this, as in other things, the “ wisdom of man, “ which is foolishness with God,” has led numbers to adopt a contrary opinion : so that whilst an elegant and admired poet hath employed his fascinating ingenuity to persuade mankind, that God is worshipped with equal acceptance “ by saint, by savage, and by sage,” or whether he be called “ Jehovah, Jove, or Lord *,” (which in this connexion may signify Baal :) it is also become a fashionable principle of modern rational divinity, that all such distinctions are immaterial, and all religions very much alike, if men be sincere in their way. Indeed, numbers seem to think what they call bigotry, though wholly free from intolerance or persecution, to be worse than any mental errors, even in respect of the object of religious worship ! and that candour and liberality of sentiment, are more important virtues, than the supreme love and spiritual adoration of Jehovah, as distinguished from all false gods !

But who does not perceive, that this principle, if carried to its obvious consequences, amounts to a rejection of the Bible, or at least puts it on the same footing with Hesiod’s Theogonia, or the Koran ? Who can avoid seeing, that it imputes bigotry and a contracted mind to the prophets and apostles, and to every approved character of holy writ, without excepting that of our Lord himself ? Nay, will it not follow from it, that Jehovah wrought many stupendous miracles to no manner of purpose ? For we must not only inquire, why Moses was so careful to distinguish the God of Israel from the idols of Egypt, and of the nations ? or what induced David to expect assistance in meeting Goliath, who despised the armies of Jehovah, “ that all the “earth might know that there was a God in Israel *?” or on what account Elijah was so earnest to determine whether the Lord or Baal were the true God †? But we must also demand, why He answered their expectations and prayers by miraculous interpositions, if the point to be decided were of little or no importance.

* Pope’s Universal Prayer.

When the God of Hezekiah delivered him from the power of the Assyrians, by the slaughter of 185,000 men; whilst Sennacherib was slain by his own sons in the house and worship “of Nisroch his God ;” the distinction between Jehovah and every idol was strongly marked. These are a few, out of very numerous instances and proofs, which might be adduced from Scripture, to confirm this point; and, if duly regarded, would be abundantly sufficient for the purpose. When our Lord told the woman of Samaria, that her nation “knew not what they worshipped, for salvation was of the Jews ‡;” when Paul proposed to declare unto the polite and philosophical Athenians that “unknown God, whom they ignorantly worshipped,” and to distinguish the Creator and Judge of the world from all their idols §; and when he informed the Corinthians that their idol sacrifices were offered unto devils, and not to God ||; they plainly showed, that such candour as is now contended for, was no part of their plan, but absolutely incompatible with it.

Indeed, the Apostle has informed us, that idolatry originated from men’s aversion to God; “they liked not to retain him in their knowledge.” (Rom. i. 18—23. 28.) His holy character and spiritual service suited not with their carnal minds: and therefore deities were invented of another sort, and a worship coincident with their corrupt inclinations was devised. When we consider how Christian festivals are generally celebrated we shall cease to wonder, that Israel preferred the golden calf to Jehovah, and joyfully “sat down to eat and drink, and rose up to play,” instead of attending the sacred ordinances of the living God : and a competent knowledge of human nature will enable us without difficulty, to account for the predilection, which that people ever manifested for the gods of the nations, and their jovial and licentious rites. For the religion of the gentiles, instead of producing any salutary effect on their conduct, led them to practise the grossest enormities ; not only without remorse, but in order to appease or find acceptance with their deities ; and thus it tended to corrupt both their principles and morals. No doubt, the great enemy of God and man, both from ambition of engrossing the worship of idolaters, and from the malignity of his nature, aided their invention, in forming the characters and imagining the exploits of their deities, partly in resemblance to his own abominable propensities, and partly according to the worst vices of mankind ; that so the most destructive crimes might be sanctioned, and the vilest affections, as it were, consecrated, by conformity to the objects of their worship. No wonder that they were ferocious in war, and debauched in their general conduct ; when their religious observances, comprised the most savage cruelties, the most shameless licentiousness, and the greatest excesses of intemperance ! and when at last they could not equal, in these respects, the gods whom they had invented for themselves !

If religion be supposed to produce any effect on the conduct of mankind, every person of common sense must allow, that the character and actions ascribed to the object of worship must be of the greatest possible importance : for as these are, so will the sincere worshipper be. To please, to resemble, to imitate the object of adoration, must be the supreme aim and ambition of every devotee, whether of Jupiter, Mars, Bacchus, Venus, Moloch, or Mammon ; as well as of every spiritual worshipper of Jchovah : and we might therefore know what to expect from any man, if we were acquainted with his sentiments concerning the God that he adores : provided we could ascertain the degree, in which he was sincere and earnest in his religion.

It would have been absurd to expect much honesty from him, who devotedly worshipped Mercury as the god of thieving; much mercy from a devotee of Moloch; love of peace from the worshipper of Mars; or chastity from the priestess of Venus: and, whatever speculators may imagine, both the Scriptures and profane history, (ancient and modern,) show that the bulk of mankind in heathen nations were far more sincere in their absurd idolatries, and more influenced by them, than professed Christians are by the Bible; because they were more congenial to corrupt nature. It is likewise a fact, that immense multitudes of human sacrifices are, at this day, annually offered according to the rules of a dark superstition; and various other flagrant immoralities sanctioned by religion, among those idolaters, who have been erroneously considered as the most inoffensive of the human race. But these effects on the moral character of mankind are not peculiar to gross idolatry: if men fancy that they worship the true God alone, and yet form a wrong notion of his character and perfections; they only substitute a more refined idolatry in the place of paganism, and worship the creature of their own imagination, though not the work of their own hands: for in what doth such an ideal Being, though called Jehovah, differ from that called Jupiter or Baal? The character ascribed to him may indeed come nearer the truth than the other, and the delusion may be more refined: but if it essentially differ from the scriptural character of God, the effect must be the same, in a measure, as to those who earnestly desire to imitate, resemble, and please the object of their adoration.

When sinful men presume to delineate the character of God for themselves, however learned or sagacious they may be, their reasons will inevitably be warped by the general depravity of fallen nature, and by their own peculiar prejudices and vices. Partial to their own character, and indulgent to their master-passion, (which perhaps they mistake for an excellency,) they will naturally ascribe to the Deity what they value in themselves, and suppose him lenient to such things as they indulge and excuse: they will be sure to arrange their plan in such a manner, as to conclude themselves the objects of his complacency, and entitled to his favour; or at least not deserving his abhorrence, and exposed to his avenging justice; they will consider their own judgment of what is fit and right, as the measure and rule of his government: their religious worship will accord to such mistaken conclusions; and the effect of their faith upon their conduct will either be inconsiderable, or prejudicial. Thus men “think that God is “altogether such a one as themselves,” (Ps. l. 21.) and a self-flattering carnalized religion is substituted for the humbling, holy, and spiritual gospel of Christ.

The different ideas which men form of God, whilst the scriptural character of him is overlooked, result from the various dispositions and propensities, which they derive from constitution, education, and habit. The voluptuary will imagine, (with a certain dissolute monarch *,) that ‘God will not damn a man for taking a little pleasure in an ‘irregular manner:’ nor can the ambitious warrior, or covetous oppressor, be convinced, that the supreme Being will demand a strict account of all the blood shed, or the injustice committed, in their respective pursuits. The speculating philosopher may imagine a Deity too dignified to notice the conduct, or too clement to punish the crimes of puny mortals; at least he will deem him very favourable to the self-wise, and such as are superior to vulgar prejudices, whatever he may do in respect to debauchees, and sanguinary tyrants. Thus men’s ideas of God are framed according to their own prevailing propensities: and then those ideas of Him reciprocally tend to form their characters, and influence their conduct, both in respect of religious duties and in the common concerns of life.

These observations suffice to show us the reason, why “the world by wisdom knew not God;” and to prove, that it is impossible in the very nature of things for a fallen creature to know him, except by revelation, and by faith appropriating the instruction thus vouchsafed: for self-love and carnal affections will so bias the mind, as to defeat the design of the most patient investigation, and to deduce erroneous conclusions from the most accurate and apparently most impartial reasonings upon this subject; except as they are conducted with a constant regard to the revelation which God hath made of himself.

Thus the Jews knew not the God they zealously worshipped: they totally mistook his character, and therefore despised and rejected “the effulgency of his glory,” and the express image of his invisible perfection; and they hated and persecuted, most conscientiously, his spiritual worshippers*. Would we then know God in a saving and sanctifying manner †, we must not “lean to our own understandings,” nor “trust in our own hearts;” we must not resort to the schools, or sit at the feet of renowned philosophers, ancient or modern: but we must apply to the word of God himself, that we may thence learn, in humble teachableness and implicit faith, what we ought to think of his perfections, and the glory and harmony of them: remembering that “his testimony is sure, and giveth wisdom to the simple:” and likewise, “that no man knoweth the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal him ‡.”

If then we carefully “search the Scriptures,” we shall find that this subject constitutes a principal part of their contents; and that the Lord makes himself known to us in two ways 1. By express declarations:—and 2. By his works and dispensations, as illustrating and exemplifying his declarations. A few hints on each of these will constitute the remaining part of this essay; it being chiefly intended to assist the serious student of the Scriptures, in profitably considering this important subject, as he proceeds with his daily researches.

‡ Matt. xi. 25—30.

I. We consider the Lord's express declarations concerning himself. There is a majesty in the passages of holy writ, that relate to the natural perfections of God, which vastly exceeds whatever is admired as sublime in Pagan writers. Jehovah speaks of himself, "as the high and lofty One, who inhabiteth eternity." "Heaven is his throne, and the earth his footstool." "The heaven of heavens cannot contain him." "All nations before Him are as nothing; they are counted to him as less than nothing, and vanity." "From everlasting to everlasting he is God;" "the Almighty, the All-sufficient God." "His wisdom is infinite." "There is no searching of his understanding." "He knoweth all things." "He searcheth the hearts of all the children of men; yea, knoweth their thoughts afar off." "There is no fleeing from his presence." "The light and darkness to him are both alike." "He dwelleth in light inaccessible, no man hath seen or can see him." "He doeth what he will in the armies of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth." "His is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, for ever;" "He is most blessed for evermore;" "for with him is no variableness or shadow of turning." These, and numberless other declarations, expressly and emphatically ascribe eternity, self-existence, omnipresence, omnipotence, omniscience, immutability, incomprehensible greatness and majesty, and essential felicity and glory in full perfection, to the Lord our God.

But in this respect the instructions of Scripture do not so materially differ from the deductions of man's reason on this subject, or at least from what it approves and allows: and it is principally to be observed, that such an infinite Agent can, with most perfect ease, superintend the affairs, whether vast or minute, of the universe: whereas some philosophers have supposed, that such an attention would be either a degradation or an encumbrance to him; thus virtually ascribing to him imperfection, and attempting to deprive him of his throne, as if he were not qualified to fill it. But indeed infinite power, knowledge, and greatness, if they could subsist without infinite truth, justice, and goodness, would be terrible beyond conception, yet not at all adorable or amiable: and these natural perfections do not so properly constitute any part of the divine character, as define and describe Him to whom that character belongs. Accordingly we continually read in the sacred Scriptures, that Jehovah "is righteous in all his ways, and holy in all his works." "He is," not only "a God of knowledge;" but "by his actions are weighed." "A God of truth without iniquity; just and right is he." "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" "for he is of purer eyes than to behold evil." So that he is declared to be both infinitely holy in his nature, and unalterably righteous in his government of the world: for "God is jealous, and the Lord revengeth; the Lord revengeth and is furious; he will take vengeance on his adversaries:" (Nah. i. 2—6.) We are indeed told by speculating men, that such expressions are only an accommodation to human infirmity, and that there are no such passions in the divine nature: and if this were merely intended to direct our interpretation of them, and to remind us, that all that perturbation which anger and revenge excite in our minds, and all those effects which flow from them, were to be excluded from our apprehensions of the Deity, it would be very proper. But surely, the only wise God knows best how to speak of himself: and we may safely "speak according to his oracles." Abhorrence of evil, and indignation against evil doers, are not sinful passions, but requisite to a holy character; and to execute vengeance on criminals is an indispensable duty to a ruler. We pretend not to explain how these things subsist in, and are exercised by the divine mind; but we know who hath said, "Vengeance is mine, and I will recompense," and we hesitate not to repeat his words, without attempting to explain away their awful import.

When we have added to this delineation, the enlarged goodness and liberality of the Lord, who delighteth in communicating being and blessedness, and “openeth his hand to fill all things living with plenteousness;” we perceive a character completely amiable, adorable, and glorious: and peculiarly animating to all obedient creatures; and must allow the reasonableness of the command, “thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength.” Yet is this very character most tremendous to sinners, who must be discouraged, and verge to despair, in proportion as they become acquainted with it; except as they attend to the discovery of his plenteous, rich, and everlasting mercy. Mercy respects misery, and transgression as the cause; it pities and relieves misery, and pardons sin: and without this attribute, even the providential goodness of God would tend to aggravate our guilt, and increase our condemnation. Mercy, therefore, is in Scripture spoken of, as the peculiar glory of God, and the grand subject of the believer’s confidence, joy, and grateful praise. Yet, when the Lord proclaims his name, as “merciful and gracious, slow to anger, long suffering, and ready to forgive;” he commonly gives some intimation, “that he will by no means clear the guilty,” or the impenitent and unbelieving. (1 Exod. xxxiv. 6. 7. Nah. i. 2—7. Rom. iii. 19—24. 2 Pet. ii. 4—9.) All his declarations of compassion and love to sinners, connect with his holy abhorrence and righteous indignation against their sins; and contain some intimations of that change, which his grace effects in those who share his pardoning love. Yet even this would be insufficient to render the exercise of mercy, (especially in that extent spoken of in Scripture,) consistent with the perfection of his holiness and justice: for should mercy be shown to such as merit vengeance, (without any provision made on that behalf,) justice would appear imperfect, its rights violated, and its glory eclipsed: the law would be in a measure degraded, and the divine purity would not shine forth in its full splen-dour. Some intimations, therefore, were given from the beginning, that mercy would be exercised in harmony with justice; and that Jehovah would, through the promised Seed, be "a just God and a Saviour." Under the old dispensation, however, his servants seem rather to have believed that it would be so, than to have had clear perceptions of the mysterious way in which it would be effected: but the New Testament hath removed the veil from the subject, provided the veil do not still remain upon our hearts. This appears to be the only method in which the divine character could be displayed to us in all its glory: at least, all created understanding must for ever have proved incapable of conceiving in what way the largest exercise of pardon and love to the vilest sinners could consist with, and illustrate the infinite justice and holiness of God, and establish his law in honour and authority. Infinite wisdom alone could devise a plan adequate to these purposes; it must spring from boundless love; and we may be sure, that the plan revealed to us was the most approved, of all that were possible, by infinite wisdom and love.

Every intimation, therefore, of a Messiah, a Mediator, a mercy-seat, a High Priest, or an atoning sacrifice, should lead our minds to the great doctrine of redemption through Emmanuel's blood, as the central point in which every part of the revelation God hath made of himself to man, must meet. But, without further anticipating this part of the subject, we may observe, that the Scriptures every where describe our God, as perfect in wisdom, holiness, justice, truth, goodness, and mercy in all its manifold exercises; they represent these attributes as the glory of his nature, and as constituting him the proper object of our supreme love, adoration, and service; as all harmonizing in his consummate character; and each of them subserving the exercise and glory of all the rest.

II. In more exactly investigating the Scriptures, we find these attributes exemplified, in the works and dispensations recorded of our God. The display of his omnipotence, and other natural perfections in the works of creation, or the miracles he wrought in delivering his servants, or punishing his enemies, is too obvious to need a particular discussion ; nor is it requisite to enlarge on his providential goodness. But that combination of justice, holiness, truth, and mercy, which hath been stated as comprising the character of God, is manifested in his dealings with his rational creatures. Infinite in holiness and justice, “ he spared not the angels that sinned, but cast them down to hell :” he denounced on fallen Adam and his race, the awful sentence, “ dust thou art and to dust thou shalt return ;” and unnumbered millions have been swept into the grave by most dire and torturing diseases. The destruction of the old world by the deluge ; that of Sodom by fire ; the plagues of Egypt ; the vengeance executed on the Canaanites : and all the judgments inflicted on the rebellious Israelites, in the wilderness, in the promised land, and through every age, are such exhibitions of these awful attributes, that our minds naturally turn from the narrative with aversion ; nor can any man fully understand them, till he hath acquired a deep sense of the evil of sin, and the justice of God. Nay, the corrections inflicted on Lot, David, and other offending believers, whose sins were eventually pardoned, display the same attributes, and authorize the same conclusions ; so that the Psalmist might well say, “ My flesh trembleth for fear of thee, and I am afraid of thy judgments.”—On the other hand, the Lord’s patience, compassion, mercy, and grace, are exhibited in all his dealings with fallen man : “ he endured with much long-suffering even the vessels of wrath :” he hath ever appeared ready to forgive the penitent, to pity the wretched, to relieve the distressed, to lift up the self-abased, and comfort the broken-hearted. “ His mercy has been upon those that feared him from generation to generation :” his dealing with Israel as a nation, and with individuals, prove this ; nor did any sinner ever humbly seek his face in vain. The faithfulness of God is so illustrated in accomplishing his promise concerning the Seed of the woman, 4000 years after it was given, that other instances need not be adduced. His judgments coincided with his threatenings, except as repentance intervened ; and a reserve of mercy was in that case implied in them all. The manifold wisdom of God is also most conspicuous, in arranging these displays of justice and mercy, so as to secure the glory of all his attributes, and to leave no man any ground to presume, or to despair. And the whole of the discoveries given us of the future judgment, and the eternal state of happiness or misery, most perfectly coincide with the declarations relative to his harmonious perfections. But of this, and of redemption by the incarnation of Emmanuel and his atoning blood, we must forbear to speak further in this place. We may, however, observe, concerning this last, which is doubtless the greatest of all the discoveries God hath given of himself, that it unavoidably leads us to fix our peculiar attention upon those mysteries of the Deity, which are so peculiar to revelation, that they who “lean to their own understandings” would represent them as contradictory and impossible. Yet, it will be shown that they are certainly revealed in Scripture ; and thence it will follow, that they are appropriated to the true Object of all adoration, and distinguish him from every idol : so that they, who reject the peculiar mysteries which it reveals, and adore not the One Name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, into which Christians are baptized, cannot be said to worship that God, whose nature and perfections are declared in the sacred Scriptures. And as all the divine perfections are only seen, in perfect harmony, “in the face of Jesus Christ ;” they, “whose eyes are blinded, that they should not see “the sight of this glory,” (2 Cor. iv. 3—6.) certainly worship the invention of their own minds and not the God who hath revealed himself to man in the person of Jesus Christ. Indeed, this is manifest from the imperfection of the object of their worship, whom they delineate as so clement, that he cannot hate and punish sin according to its desert ; and by the blasphemies which they often utter against God’s justice and holiness, and the judgments which he hath executed and threatened. Let us then regard this, as a matter of the greatest possible importance, and seek the knowledge of God from his word, and the teaching of his Spirit, as the fundamental concern in all our religious inquiries : that so we may be engaged, above all things, to fear, love, confide in, worship, and serve him ; and to seek all our happiness in enjoying his favour, and glorifying his name.

ESSAY IV.

A Brief Exposition of the Ten Commandments, as comprising the Substance of the Moral Law.

FROM the scriptural character of God, we proceed to the consideration of his moral government, as made known to us by revelation : and a clear knowledge of his holy law is peculiarly requisite, in forming our judgment on this subject. This was delivered to Israel by Jehovah himself, from Mount Sinai, with most tremendous displays of his majesty, power, and justice : and though other Scriptures must be adduced, as a divinely inspired comment ; yet the decalogue may properly be taken for our text, in examining the demands of the moral law—It is evident, that there is a distinction between moral precepts and positive institutions : some things are in themselves so indifferent, that the same authority, which commanded, might have forbidden them ; as the use of bread and wine in one ordinance, and that of water in another : but it is absurd to suppose, that God could have required his creatures to despise him or to hate one another ; or to have forbidden them to speak truth and to do justice.

Some traces of the moral law are discoverable by our natural reason, and the whole accords to it : it has its foundation in the nature of God and man, in the relations men bear to Him, and to each other, and in the obligations that result from them ; on which account it is immutable in its requirements, and demands obedience from all mankind, as far as they have an opportunity of becoming acquainted with it. Different circumstances may indeed occasion a coincident variation; as the entrance of sin hath rendered patience, and forgiveness of injuries, exercises of our love to God and our neighbours: but though these will cease in heaven, yet the grand principles whence they are deduced will continue the same to eternity.

The law is also spiritual; that is, it takes cognizance of our spirits, or our most secret thoughts, desires, purposes and dispositions; and demands the exact regulation of the judgment, will, and affections, in conformity to the holy excellencies of the divine character. Love is its principal requisition, without which the best external obedience is condemned as hypocrisy. This is peculiar to the law of God, who alone can search the heart: but in common with other laws, it requires entire, uninterrupted and perpetual obedience; for no law can tolerate the transgression of itself. From the entrance to the close of life the Lord enjoins upon us exact conformity to every precept: every deviation from this perfect rule, whether by omission or commission, excess or defect, is sin; and every sin deserves wrath, and needs forgiveness, (Rom. iii. 19—23.)

As the ten commandments are divinely commented upon in all the preceptive part of Scripture; so the substance of them is summed up, in the two great commands of “loving God with all our heart, with all our mind, with all our soul, and with all our strength,” and of “loving our neighbours as ourselves:” and we are authorized by our Lord’s example, to interpret every one of them in the strictest, most spiritual, and most extensive sense, of which it is capable. Even repentance, faith in Christ, and all other evangelical graces and duties, are exercises of this entire love to God, and required of a sinner as placed under a dispensation of mercy; though originally the law had nothing to do with redemption, but lay at the foundation of another covenant. We may, therefore, wave the controversy concerning the rule of duty; whether it be the ten commandments, or the whole word of God: for the one, properly understood, will be found as broad as the other: seeing we cannot love God with all our hearts; unless we love every discovery he is pleased to make of his glory, believe every testimony and embrace every promise which he gives, and seek his favour in the use of all the means he is pleased to appoint. Yet this relates only to the law, as the rule of duty, and as given in subserviency to the gospel: for originally it contains nothing about mercy, repentance, or acceptance of imperfect obedience; but only says, "Do this and live," and "Cursed be every transgressor."

Thus the law was given to Israel, not only to show them their real condition according to the covenant of works, but also with reference to their national covenant, and as the rule of duty to redeemed sinners: and therefore mercy is mentioned in the second commandment; not indeed as communicated by the law, but as shown by the Lord to his obedient people. The remainder of this essay will consist of a compendious exposition of the ten commandments, as introductory to a further consideration of the divine government.

The great Lawgiver prefaced his injunctions, by proclaiming his own essential glory and immutable excellency, "I am JEHOVAH." As the source of existence, and consequently of all power, wisdom, justice, truth, and goodness, He is the standard of excellence and beauty; from whom all created amiableness is an emanation, of whose glory it is a feeble reflection. To Him alone the throne belongs; He only is qualified to be the universal Lawgiver and judge; and he has the sole and unalienable title to that love and service which his law demands.—To this he added, "THY GOD," to express Israel's relation and obligation to him. We all are rational creatures, and every benefit he bestows binds us more forcibly to love and obedience. We, like Israel, are his professed worshippers; if we be what we profess, He is our portion and everlasting felicity; and this still enhances our obligations to devote ourselves to his service. The redemption of Israel from the house of bondage was typical of our redemption by Jesus Christ from sin and misery : and though all men ought to obey the law of God, yet none do render any spiritual obedience to it, except his redeemed people.

After this solemn introduction, Jehovah first added, "Thou shalt have no other gods before me." The commandments are addressed, in the singular number, to each person, because every one is concerned in them on his own account; and each prohibition implies a positive duty. This first requires a disposition and conduct suited to the relation in which we stand to "the Lord our God." He alone is the adequate object of our love, and able to satisfy our capacity of happiness : all we have and are belong to him, and he has an unalienable right to prescribe the use that we should make of all his gifts. He has so clear a title to our love, gratitude, reverence, adoration, submission, credence, confidence, and obedience ; that we cannot withhold them from Him without the most manifest injustice. Considering who He is, and what He hath done for us, except we love him, to the full extent of all our natural powers, we do not render him his due ; and if we thus loved him all contrary affections would be excluded, all inferior affections subordinated. Admiring his excellency, desiring and delighting in him and his favour, being grateful for his kindness, and zealous for his glory, with all the energy of our whole souls ; it is evident, that we should love other objects only for his sake, and according to his will : no creature could then rival him in our affections, or prevail with us to neglect his service ; and whilst we rendered him the tribute of adoring love and praise, and so glorified Him, we should possess unalloyed felicity in the enjoyment of his favour. This is the reasonable state in which things ought to be ; and all that deviates from it is sin, and the effect of man's apostacy.

In the preceding essay, some thoughts have been offered on man's propensity to idolatry. To the disgrace of the human understanding, the grossest species of it have been very general in the world ; and a more refined and plausible kind of idolatry hath often supplanted them in those few places, where something more rational hath prevailed. We need not, however, enlarge on this violation of the first commandment, or show particularly how the Pagans, and Israel, and some parts of the professing church of Christ, by worshipping creatures, have ascribed to them the glory of those attributes, which Jehovah incommunicably possesses. This must be allowed to be the grand transgression of this law, and all pretences to witchcraft, fortune-telling, charms, or incantations, partake in a measure of the same guilt ; as information, or assistance, are professedly sought from creatures, where God should be wholly depended on and submitted to. But this spiritual precept reaches much further. To love, desire, delight in, or expect good from, any forbidden indulgence, even in the smallest degree, must be a violation of it ; and to suffer the most excellent or amiable of creatures to rival God in our affections, must be a proportionable contempt of him. Atheism and irreligion violate this law ; for by them men set up themselves as gods, aspire to independence, reject subordination, and refuse to render homage or worship to any superior being, as if they had created themselves, and were sufficient for their own happiness ! The proud man idolizes himself, and offers incense to his own deity ; and therefore God resisteth him as his rival. The ambitious pay homage to the opinions of men, and seek happiness in their applause, or in such honourable distinctions as they can bestow ; the revengeful usurp the throne of God, and invade the prerogative of him to “ whom vengeance belongeth ” The covetous deifies his wealth, the sensualist his vile appetites, and the rapturous lover his mistress ; he lives on her smiles, his heaven is placed in her favour, and her frown would make him the most wretched of all creatures. Nay, the doating husband and fond parent may deify the object of their affections : for though they ought to love them tenderly ; yet it should be in subordination to the will and glory of God.

But no comment can equal the extent of this command. Whatsoever consists not with the most perfect love, gratitude, reverence, submission, and devotedness of the whole heart to God, is a transgression of it; and it requires us to love the Lord, and all his creatures, according to their real worthiness, not more nor less, except as finite beings cannot love infinite excellency in an adequate manner. Obedience to it enthrones the Lord in our judgments and affections; and the whole of our love being thus given to Him, we should love all others for his sake, and according to the measure that he hath enjoined; whilst the violation of it destroys this regular subordination, and gives the creatures the throne in our hearts. Well therefore may it stand foremost in the decalogue, for our obedience in all other things depends on it; other transgressions injure the subject, and affront the Sovereign; but the violation of this law is high treason against the majesty of heaven; and it is equally destructive to the happiness of all who transgress it. The expression "before me," implied that idolatry could not be kept so secret, but it would be known to the Lord; it would at all times affront him to his face; but especially when committed by Israel, who had his glory continually displayed before their eyes.

II. The second commandment requires us to render the Lord our God a worship and service, suited to his perfections, and honourable to his name. His incomprehensible nature cannot be represented by any similitude. The most exquisite painting or sculpture can only give an external resemblance of a man: even animal life with its several functions cannot be thus exhibited, much less can a likeness be made of the soul and its operations. How dishonourable then must every attempt be to represent the infinite God, "by silver, or gold, graven by art and man's device!" The general disposition of mankind, to form such similitudes of the Deity, proves that low apprehensions of him are congenial to our nature; and the practice hath exceedingly increased the confusion and grossness of men's conceptions concerning him. The more stupid of the heathens alone worshipped the picture or image itself; others used it as a visible representation of the invisible Numer or Deity; and all that ingenious papists have urged in behalf of their images, is equally applicable to Israel's worship of the golden calves, or that rendered by the Ephesians to the image of Diana which fell down from Jupiter. A material image of the Deity is likewise an affront to the Person of Christ, the only adequate "Image of the invisible God;" and the worship of saints and angels, as mediators and present deities, by images, in every respect robs him of his mediatorial glory.—The commandment does not prohibit the making of images and pictures for other purposes, (as some have ignorantly supposed,) for God commanded several to be made even in the construction of the tabernacle: but the making of them, in order to men's bowing down before and worshipping them; and in this case both the image-maker and the image-worshipper are involved in the guilt. The prohibition includes every kind of creature, because all are utterly unfit to represent the infinite Creator: and there are some devices common among us, as emblematic of the Trinity, which seem not to accord to the strictness of injunction. But the spiritual import of the commandment reaches much further.—Superstition, and human inventions in religious worship, as if they could procure us acceptance with God, are evident violations of its spirit and intent. The use of things indifferent in religion, without any commands from God, leads men's minds to gross conceptions of him, as if he delighted in outward splendour or external forms; and it commonly connects with a false dependence, substitutes something else in the place of God's appointments, and tends to an usurped authority over men's consciences. But many circumstances of worship must be regulated by human discretion: and every man should judge for himself which regulations tend to these evils, and which do not; and be candid in judging such as differ from him:—Hypocrisy and formality, arising from unworthy apprehensions of God, together with those unscriptural delineations of his character that have been described, are certainly here prohibited.—In short the second commandment requires us to conceive of God, in all respects as far as we are able, according to the revelation he hath made of himself to us; to realize his glorious presence to our minds; by faith, not by fancy; and to worship him as a spirit, in spirit and truth, not with corporeal representations of him before our eyes, our low conceptions of him in our minds, but sincerely, inwardly, with the most fervent affections, and profound reverence of his infinite majesty; in all his appointed ordinances, and in them alone, and with frequency, as performing a service reasonable in itself, and most pleasant to our own souls, as well as honourable to his great name.

The reason given for the prohibition of image-worship, shows us that the Lord is so tenacious of his honour in this matter, (especially in respect of his professed people,) that the least approach to it will excite his hottest displeasure, even as the jealous husband is exasperated, and roused to seek vengeance, by whatever leads him to suspect his wife of adultery. If Israel, or any Israelites revolted to idolatry, they would be deemed haters of God; as the wife would be supposed to hate her husband, when she preferred every worthless stranger to him: and the national covenant, with its peculiar blessings, being forfeited, the sins of the parents would involve their offspring in the punishment, even to the third or fourth generation. The mention made of mercy, even to thousands, to vast multitudes, through successive ages to the end of time, relates to the law as given in subserviency to the gospel, which was administered to the Israelites by their legal expiations and purifications; and it shows how the Lord delights in pardoning the penitent, and blessing the obedient. Thus the natural affection of men for their children, should have engaged the Israelites to obedience; and by every tie they were kept close to the instituted worship of God, and at a distance from all idolatry.

III The worshippers of the Lord must have frequent occasion to mention his name: and sometimes it will be requisite for them to call him to witness the truth of their words, or to bind themselves by vows and engagements as in his sight. The third commandment, therefore, prohibits us "to take the name of the Lord our God in vain," that is, to use it needlessly, irreverently, profanely, or in fraud, dissimulation, and hypocrisy. It forbids all rash and unlawful vows, and such as relate to things uncertain or impracticable.—Perjury, of every kind, is the capital transgression of it: for by this men appeal to the omniscient heart-searching God for the truth of what they testify or assert, or their sincerity in what they engage to do; when they do not know the truth of the one, and are consciously insincere in the other. This is one of the most atrocious and provoking crimes imaginable, though common among us to an inconceivable degree; so that it is little noticed except it be accompanied with flagrant injustice! For it is connected with other instances of disregard to this law: by the unnecessary multiplication of oaths in our judicial transactions, even on the most frivolous occasions; and by the extreme irreverence with which they are administered, which should always be done, if possible, with all the solemnity of a religious ordinance, or act of worship.—All appeals to God in common conversation, with such expressions, as 'the Lord knows;' when the matter attested is either not true or not important, involves a measure of the same guilt. All cursing and swearing are a most horrid violation of this commandment. The use of the words, 'God, Lord, Christ,' or such like, without necessity, seriousness, and reverence, whether in improper religious discourse, or as expletives in talking about other matters; every expression that takes the form of an adjuration or imprecation, though the name of God be not used; yea, all that is more than yea, yea, nay, nay, in common discourse; all jesting with God's word or sacred things; all irreverence to whatever relates to him, and the use of his tremendous name, in religious worship, after a heedless or hypocritical manner; all these, I say, are violations of the spirit of this law. Moreover it implies a command to remember habitually the infinite majesty, purity, and excellency of God ; to behave towards him, in word and deed, with that awe and reverence of his perfections, which becomes such mean and worthless creatures in his infinitely glorious presence.—To this law is added, that “ God will not hold the transgressor guiltless.” Men may not discover, or they may neglect to punish, this crime ; the sinner’s conscience may scarcely trouble him about it : but let him know that God will most certainly detect and punish that atrocious affront which is thus put upon him, and often without the plea of temptation, or expectation of profit or pleasure ; unless men can find pleasure in disobeying and defying their creator ! But when it shall at last be said to the daring transgressor, “ wherefore hast thou despised the commandment of the Lord ?” His profane trifling will be turned into terror and despair.

IV. The form of the fourth commandment implies, that it had been previously known to Israel, though they were prone to forget it. The separation of a portion of our time to the immediate service of God is doubtless of moral obligation ; for his glory, and our good, personal and social, temporal and eternal, are intimately connected with it : but the exact proportion, as well as the particular day, may be considered as of positive institution. Yet the proportion of one day in seven seems to have been fixed by infinite wisdom as most proper, in every age of the world : though the change of the dispensation, at the coming of Christ and after his resurrection, has occasioned an alteration of the day, and an addition to the topics, to be peculiarly commemorated and meditated on, during the sacred rest. The sabbath among the Israelites was also ceremonial, and therefore it forms a part of that law : and being introduced into the judicial law, the violation of it was punishable by the magistrate : which seems also to be proper in all communities where Christianity is professed. Six days are allowed us for the diligent performance of our worldly business ; but the seventh is consecrated to the immediate service of the Lord. Our souls indeed must be attended to, and our God worshipped, every day, that our business may be regulated in subserviency to his will: but on these days “we should do all our work,” with the sole exception of works of charity, piety, and necessity; for “the sabbath was made for man.” All works, therefore, of avarice, distrust, luxury, vanity, and self-indulgence, are entirely prohibited. Our affairs should be previously so arranged, that as little as possible of a secular nature may interrupt the sacred duties of the Lord’s day. Trading, paying wages, settling accounts, writing letters of business, or reading books on ordinary subjects, trifling visits, journeys, excursions, dissipation, converse which only amuses, cannot consist with “keeping a day “holy to the Lord:” and sloth is a carnal not a spiritual rest. The sabbath should be a cessation from worldly labour, and a rest in the service of God: serious self-examination, perusal of the Scripture, closet, family, and public worship, instruction of children and servants, meditation and pious conversation, should occupy our time, from morning till evening; except as these duties are suspended by attention to such things, as really conduce to our own good or that of others. All this is obligatory on those who can do it: but servants, and others, may be under a real necessity of doing things which are not necessary in themselves; though liberty of this kind should be preferred to gain, and good management might often greatly lessen this evil. Were our love to God and spiritual things as intense as it ought to be, we should deem a day thus spent our great delight; for heaven will be an eternal rest not essentially differing from it. All our aversion to such strictness arises from “the carnal mind which is enmity against God:” and the advantages that would accrue from thus hallowing the sabbath, to the morals, health, liberty, and happiness of mankind, are so many and obvious, that they who doubt its obligation, often allow its expediency. But men should not only forbear to set their children, servants, or slaves about any needless work; they should also with authority require them to keep holy the Lord’s day, which is greatly intended for their benefit. The cattle must also be allowed to rest from the hard labour of husbandry, journeys, and other employments connected with trade or pleasure; though doubtless we may employ them too, in works of necessity, piety, and charity: and thus they may properly be used for the gentle service of conveying those to places of public worship, who could not otherwise attend, or perform the duties to which they are called: yet ostentation and self-indulgence multiply violations of the Lord's day in this respect. Even strangers, residing among us, should be persuaded to hallow, and restrained from profaning the sabbath.—It was indeed originally instituted in honour of God our Creator: reasons are adduced in other parts of Scripture, which peculiarly respected the Jews, or referred to the cause of humanity: but redemption by Christ, as completed in his resurrection, and the descent of the Holy Ghost to glorify him, are especially commemorated by Christians, whilst they hallow the first of the week, as the Lord's day.—This very compendious exposition of the first table of the law suffices to prove its requirements to be very extensive, spiritual, reasonable, and beneficial; yet it must be owned to be entirely contrary to the disposition of our hearts, and diverse from the tenor of our lives: we all, therefore, need mercy, redemption, and a new creation to holiness, in order that we may please God and be made fit for heaven.—We proceed to the second table.

V. This commandment of honouring parents must be considered as the abstract of our relative duties. All other relations spring from that of parents and children, or partake in a measure of its nature; and this shadows out our relation to the great Creator. Children are required to honour their parents; which implies that it is the duty of parents to behave honourably, by diligently performing the several parts of their important charge, as entrusted with the care of their offspring, both in body and soul; and by a becoming deportment in all other respects. Yet children are not absolved from their duty by the parents' sin, for which they must answer to God : and such a limitation, in this and other relative precepts, would absurdly constitute all the inferior relations to be judges and lords over their superiors. Children under God, derive their being from their parents ; and they are generally taken care of by them, during helpless infancy and inexperienced youth, with much labour and expense. It is, therefore, reasonable, that they should so long obey them unreservedly in all things lawful ; and afterwards in all things that are not manifestly injurious to them, though they should be disagreeable. They ought to love their persons, respect their characters, counsels, and instructions ; consult their interest, ease, credit, and comfort ; conceal their infirmities, bear with their tempers and humours, alleviate their sorrows, and rejoice their hearts as far as possible ; and when they are grown old and incapable of maintaining themselves, they are bound, if able, even to labour for their support, as their parents did for them when infants. In all this, both parents are equally included ; and should alike be honoured and obeyed, and not in opposition to one another, which should teach them to set their children an example of impartiality, and to be harmonious in their conduct towards them. By parity of reason, they who have acted a parent's part, are intitled to a correspondent respect and deference ; and all the superior and inferior relations have their several reciprocal duties, which may be referred to this command ; but will be distinctly considered in a separate Essay, on a future occasion. The annexed promise of long life to obedient children might have a peculiar reference to the covenant of Israel ; yet careful observers of mankind have noted its remarkable fulfilment in other nations. Subordination in the family and community tends to personal and public felicity ; and the dislike which the human heart bears to submission, renders it proper to enforce it by motives of every kind.

VI. This commandment requires us to " love our neighbour as ourselves," in respect of his person and life. Magistrates, as " God's ministers in executing ven“geance,” are in some cases commanded to put men to death; and in others it may be allowable, because conducive to the public good. Witnesses or executioners may concur in such capital punishments. We may doubtless take away another’s life in defence of our own; and perhaps in some cases in defence of our property.—Some wars are necessary, and the blood shed in them is not imputed as murder to those that shed it; yet the guilt of it must rest somewhere; and alas! few wars are so entered upon and conducted, as to leave any of the contending parties free from blood-guiltiness. A man may by misfortune kill another; yet God condemns as wilful murder many of those incidents, which are called by our law manslaughter. Furious passion, excited by sudden provocation or drunkenness, is no where in Scripture excepted from the general rule, “He who sheddeth man’s blood, by man shall his blood be shed.” The duellist is a revengeful murderer of the most atrocious kind: all fighting for wagers or renown violates this command, and the blood thus shed is murder. What then shall we think of the accursed slave trade, which will surely bring vengeance on this nation, if much longer tolerated!—Even laws, needlessly sanguinary, (as I fear many are in this land,) involve the persons concerned in this enormous guilt; and they, who should punish the murderer and yet suffer him to escape, will be numbered among the abettors of his crime at God’s tribunal. The commandment likewise prohibits us to assault, maim, or wound others, or to assist those that do; to tempt men to crimes that destroy their constitutions, or endanger their lives, either from the sword of justice, or the resentment of the injured party; nay, to entice men, by the prospect of a large reward, to such enterprises and labours as are known generally to shorten life. Many parents and wives are murdered by the gross misconduct of their children or husbands; and numbers will be found guilty of transgressing it, by covetously or maliciously wishing the death of others. The spiritual import of the commandment prohibits all envy, revenge, hatred, or causeless anger ; all that insulting language which provokes to wrath and murder ; and all the pride, ambition, or covetousness which prompt to it. Nay, that man will be condemned as the hater and murderer of his brother, who seeing his life endangered by the want of food, raiment, or medicine, and having ability to relieve him, selfishly neglects to do it, (1 John iii. 15—17.)—But the murderer of the soul is still more heinous. This is committed by seducing men to sin ; by a bad example ; by disseminating poisonous principles ; by terrifying others from religion by persecution, or reviling or ridiculing such as attend to it ; and by withholding due instructions, warnings, and counsels, especially such as parents owe to their children, or ministers to their people : and it is tremendous to think, what numbers will be thus condemned as the murderers of the souls of men.—The heinousness of suicide likewise should be especially marked—It is in reality the most malignant of all murders ; and as scarcely ever repented of, it combines the guilt of murdering both soul and body at once. We were not the authors, and are not the lords, of our own lives ; nor may we leave our assigned post or rush without a summons into the presence of our judge ; any more than we may execute vengeance on our neighbour, or send him to God's tribunal. Self-murder may be easily shown to be a complication of ingratitude, contempt of the Lord's gift of life, defiance, impatience, pride, rebellion, and infidelity ; nor is it generally the effect of insanity, (as verdicts, in which perjury is committed from false tenderness, would lead us to suppose ;) except as all are in some sense insane, who are hurried on by fierce passions and Satan's temptations. That original murderer knows this present life to be the only season, in which salvation can be obtained ; and therefore, he tempts men to such excesses as destroy the constitution, or as render life miserable ; and he urges them on to suicide, that he may destroy body and soul by their hands, not being permitted to do it by his own power. Extravagance, discontent, and despondency, should therefore be most carefully shunned ; and gratitude, patience, and hope most diligently cultivated, that he may be disappointed.—In a word, this command requires enlarged benevolence, kindness, long-suffering, and forgiveness ; and a disposition to seek the welfare in all respects of every human being.

VII. This commandment regulates our love to our neighbours, in respect of their purity and domestic comfort ; and requires the proper government of those inclinations which God hath implanted in order to the increase of the human species. The marriage of one man with one woman was originally the institution of the Creator, and not merely a civil contract, as some pretend : these “ became one flesh,” inseparably united for helps meet to each other, to promote and share one another’s satisfactions, and with united attention to educate their common offspring. The entrance of sin and death made way for the dissolution of this union ; a variety of evils began to embitter the relation ; and abuses were soon introduced. But though some things were formerly connived at, which accorded not with the original institution ; yet Christ refers his disciples to that as the standard of honourable marriage, as far as the change of circumstances can admit of it. The force acquired by men’s passions in consequence of sin, renders the “ prevention of fornications” one express end of marriage ; mutual forbearance and reciprocal compliances are now needful and incumbent ; the sorrows of the female sex, as well as the afflictions of life, require peculiar sympathy to alleviate the anguish of the suffering party : whilst the separating stroke of death leaves the survivor free to take another companion. We must not then define adultery, as prohibited in this commandment, according to the judicial law of Moses, but by the decisions of Christ ; with which polygamy and divorces, (except for unfaithfulness,) are utterly incompatible. It is evident, that marriage, (being recognized in some appointed way, to distinguish it from illicit connexions,) gives each party such a property in the other’s person and affections, that every violation of conjugal fidelity, on either side, is adultery, according to the New Testament; and far more deserves death, (if we estimate crimes by the mischief they do,) than many offences which are capitally punished. All other commerce between the sexes is prohibited by the spirit of this law; from the temporary connexions, that are formed and dissolved at pleasure, to the lowest scenes of prostitution. The difference between the tempters and the tempted, and other circumstances, vary the degree of guilt contracted; the seducer's character is diabolical: but fornication is in almost every black catalogue in the Scripture: and, however men may be deceived by vain words, its dire effects on the human species prove the goodness, as well as justice of God in this arrangement.—Under the word lasciviousness, various transgressions are denoted, which cannot be mentioned without offence: nay, every thing, which does not comport with the design of marriage, though sanctioned by that name, violates the spiritual meaning of the prohibition. All polluted discourse, imaginations, or desires, are condemned by it; “he that looketh on a woman “to lust after her, hath committed adultery with her already in his heart.” Writing, publishing, vending, circulating, or reading obscene books; exposing to view indecent pictures or statues, or whatever else may excite men's passions, must partake of the same guilt: whilst wit, elegance, and ingenuity, only increase the mischief, wherever the specious poison is administered. All the arts of dress, motion, or demeanor, which form temptations to heedless youth; with all those blandishments, insinuations, amorous looks and words, which subserve seduction, fall under the same censure. In short the commandment requires the utmost purity, both of the body and soul, in secret as well as before men; with an holy indifference to animal indulgences, and strict government of all the appetites, senses, and passions: and it enjoins the desire and endeavour of preserving the same disposition and behaviour in all others also, as far as we have it in our power.

VIII. This commandment is the law of love in respect of property. The productions of the earth are obtained and prepared for use by labour: this gives property, and that justly descends to the owner's posterity or heirs. From this and similar causes, combining their effects for ages, the difference in men's circumstances originates. That portion which we can honestly obtain, is, "the bread, in which God hath given us," with which we should be satisfied. But men's passions crave more, and sloth refuses to labour: hence force and fraud are employed to get possession of the property of others, without their free consent. We need not enumerate those violations, of which human laws take cognizance: but men may in various ways break the divine law, and yet escape present punishment. Fraudulent bargains which impose on the ignorant, credulous, or necessitous; abuse of confidence, extortion, exorbitant gain, deceitful combinations to enhance the price of goods, or lower the wages of the poor, will be condemned at God's tribunal as violations of it. The overgrown ravager of nations and provinces, will be adjudged a principal thief and robber, without any other distinction. Plundering the public, whether by oppressive rulers and exorbitant exactions, or by smuggling and evading taxes; contracting debts to support vanity and luxury, or in pursuit of some scheme of aggrandizement, or for any thing not absolutely necessary, without a fair prospect of paying them; taking advantage of humane laws, to evade payment, when the insolvents are again able to do it; all extravagance, beyond the sober allowance of a man's income; and slothfulness, or unnecessary subsistence upon charity; are violations of this law in different ways. Indeed it cannot consist with it to withhold from real objects of compassion proper relief; or to squeeze the poor so low in their wages, that they can scarcely subsist, that men may live in affluence and enrich their families. In short the spirit of it prohibits covetousness, luxury, and the pride of life; and it requires industry, frugality, sobriety, submission to God's providence, and a disposition "to do to all others," in respect of worldly property, "as we would they should do unto us."

IX. This commandment is the law of love, as it respects our neighbour's reputation: though, in the connexion of human affairs, the violation of it may likewise affect his property and life; and bearing false witness, in a court of justice among us, may be perjury, robbery, and murder, as well as calumny. In such important concerns, we should testify nothing, of which we have not the fullest assurance; and every human passion should be watched over, that our evidence may not be warped by any of them. We should be exact to a word in reporting what we know, and in speaking the truth, and no more than the truth: and equal caution is required in juries, and in the judge who decides the cause.—The malicious invention and circulation of slanderous reports, to the injury of a man's character, has a large proportion of the same atrocious guilt. To do this in sport is an imitation of the madman, who throws about arrows, firebrands, and death, for his diversion: to spread such stories as others have framed to the discredit of our neighbour, when we suspect them to be false or aggravated; or even, if we suppose or know them to be true, when there is no real occasion for it, (such as the detection of a mischievous hypocrite or designing villain,) is prohibited by this law: for the practice results from pride, self-preference, malevolence, or conceited affectation of wit and humour. Severe censures, bitter sarcasms, ridicule, harsh judgments, ascribing good actions to bad motives, inuendos, misrepresentations, collecting and vending family anecdotes, and various other practices of the same nature, consist not with it. This commandment is frequently violated by authors; a lie or slander is far worse when printed, than when only spoken; and religious controversy is too generally disgraced by the most abominable calumnies: for bigots of all parties agree in mis-stating the actions, misquoting the writings, and mis-reporting the words of their opponents. All lies are a violation of this law. They are in every possible case an abuse of speech, and of our neighbour's confidence, and a derogation from the valuation of truth; and almost always injurious to mankind. Envy of others' praise also runs counter to the spirit of the law. In short, it requires sincerity, truth, fidelity, candour, and caution; with a disposition to honour what is honourable in all men, and to be as tender of their reputation, as we could reasonably expect them to be of ours. With this in constant view, our feelings will instruct us how far this rule should extend its influence on our conduct.

X. Lastly, we are commanded not to covet any thing that is our neighbour's. This restriction is placed as the fence of all the rest: the Apostle's reference to it, (Rom. vii. 7, 8.) shows that it comprises the utmost spirituality of the law; and it is a perpetual confutation of all those systems, by which the outward gross crime is considered as the only violation of the command. We must not so much as desire any thing whatsoever, which God forbids, or which his providence withholds: and so far from leveling property, or seizing violently on our neighbour's possessions, we may not so much as hanker after them. The most secret wish for another man's wife violates this precept: but to desire an union with an unmarried woman, only becomes sinful when it is excessive, and when it is not submitted to the will of God if he render it impracticable. We may desire that part of a man's property, which he is inclined to dispose of, if we only mean to obtain it on equitable terms: but what he chooses to keep we may not covet. The poor man may desire moderate relief from the rich: but he must not hanker after his affluence, or repine even if he do not relieve him. Men exposed to equal hazards, may agree to a proportionable contribution to him who suffers loss; for it accords with the law of love to help the distressed. This exculpates insurance when fairly conducted. But every species of gaming originates from an undue desire and hope of increasing wealth by proportionably impoverishing other men; and is, therefore, a direct violation of this law. Public gaming, by lotteries, so far from being less criminal than other species of that vice, is the worst of them all: for it abets and sanctions, as far as example and concurrence can do it, a practice which opens the door to every species of fraud and villainy; which is pregnant with the most extensive evils to the community and to individuals; which seldom fails to bring several to an untimely end by suicide or the sentence of the law; which unsettles an immense multitude from the honest employments of their station, to run in quest of imaginary wealth; and which exposes them to manifold temptations, unfits them for returning to their usual mode of life, and often materially injures their circumstances, breaks their spirits, sours their tempers, and excites the worst passions of which they are susceptible. Indeed, the evil of lotteries, political, moral, and religious, are too glaring to be denied even by those who plead necessity for continuing them; and too numerous to be recapitulated in this place. Can it therefore consist with the law of God, "Thou shalt not covet," or with the character of a Christian, to concur in such an iniquitous and injurious system, from a vain desire of irregular gain? Whatever argument proves it unlawful for two or three men to cast lots for a sum of money, or to game in any other way, much more strongly concludes against a million of persons gaming publicly by a lottery for a month or six weeks together, to the stagnation in a great measure of every other business: whilst the gain made by government and by individuals, from the stakes deposited with them, renders it as impolitic as unlawful; for every individual stakes three to two on an even chance, if a covetous appeal to providence may be so called.—(Prov. xvi. 33.) Even Tontines seem not wholly excusable. These constitute a kind of complicated wager about longevity, to be decided by Providence in favour of the survivors; and must therefore be equally culpable with other games of chance.—Coveting other men's property, contrary to the law of love, and enriching the survivors commonly at the expense of the relatives of the deceased, are intimately connected with them: whilst they lead men into strong temptations secretly to wish the death of others, for the sake of advantages which they inordinately desire and irregularly pursue.—In fine, discontent, distrust, love of wealth, pleasure, and grandeur, desire of change, the habit of wishing, and every inordinate affection, are the evils here prohibited; and we know them to be the sources of all other crimes, and of man's misery. And the command requires moderation in respect of all worldly things, submission to God, acquiescence in his will, love to his commands, and a reliance on him for the daily supply of all our wants as he sees good.

We cannot close this brief explication of the divine law, (in which we find nothing redundant, defective, or injurious, but all things holy, just, and good,) more properly, than by the words of our church-service, 'Lord have mercy upon us,' (forgiving all our past transgressions,) 'and write all these thy laws in our hearts, we beseech thee.'

ESSAY V.

On Man's situation, as a Sinner, in this present World.

THE Apostle has defined sin to be "the transgression of the law," (1 John iii. 4) and whatever, in any respect or degree, deviates from this perfect rule, is sin, and exposes a man to condemnation. "By the law," therefore, "is the knowledge of sin:" (Rom. iii. 20.) the better we understand the holy, just, and good commandments of God; the more enlarged will be our acquaintance with the vast variety of sins that are continually committed, as well as with the evil and desert of every transgression: and a comprehensive knowledge of our whole duty is essential to a just estimate of our own character, or our situation in respect to the eternal world.

But we should not only attend to the requirements and prohibitions of the divine law ; its sanctions also demand our most serious consideration. Indeed the law, strictly speaking, (as distinguished from the gospel,) is merely a rule and a sanction : a rule formed by infinite wisdom, holiness, and goodness, and enforced by supreme authority ; a sanction to be awarded by immutable justice and almighty power, according to the declarations of eternal truth. Repentance and amendment are right, and accord to the spirit of the commandment ; but they make no compensation for transgression, and are not noticed by the law : and the mercy exercised by the Lawgiver has reference to the provisions of another covenant. Perfect obedience is the uniform demand of the precept ; condemnation inevitably follows transgression. “ Whosoever shall keep the whole “ law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all ;” (James ii. 8—11.) even as a man is condemned for violating one of the many statutes of the realm, in a single instance, though no other offence be charged upon him. The Apostle therefore declares, that “ as many as are of “ the works of the law, are under the curse ; for it is “ written, cursed is every one, that continueth not,” (during his whole life,) “ in all things which are written in the “ book of the law to do them :” (Deut. xxvi. 15, 16.) and the moral law must at least be included in this general language. They alone, who have at all times perfectly kept the whole law, can have the least claim to the reward which it proposes, for “ the man that doeth” the commandments “ shall live in them,” but “ the soul that sinneth, shall die.” And as “ all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God,” (of rendering to him the glory due to his name :) so in this respect “ there is no difference,” but every mouth “ shall be stopped, and all the world shall become guilty before God ;” (Rom. iii. 9—23.) though an immense difference will be found between some men and others, in respect of the nature, number, and aggravations, of their offences. All attempts, therefore, in a sinner to justify himself, must result from ignorance of God and his law, and of himself ; or from a disposition to impeach the strictness of the law, and the justice of the Lawgiver.

Our Lord himself explains the import of the curse of the law, from which he redeemed his people by becoming a curse for them, when he forwarns us, that he will say to the wicked at the day of judgment, "Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels;—and these shall go away into everlasting punishment." (Matt. xxv. 41—46.) In reflecting on this awful subject, we should recollect that man is constituted of body and soul; and that the soul purposes the act of disobedience, while the body executes its purposes; so that it is highly reasonable to suppose, that the soul will at least share the punishment which the law denounces against the offender. When therefore, the apostle remindeth his brethren of their obligations to the Lord Jesus, he says, "Who delivered us from the wrath to come?" (Thess. i. 10.) whence it is evident, that he considered himself and all the Christians in the world, to have been previously exposed, not only to present effects of the divine displeasure, (from which Jesus does not deliver his people,) but also to future condemnation. The original transgression, through which by "one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin," was indeed a violation of a positive injunction; but love to God, to himself, and to his posterity, absolutely required Adam to obey it; so that by disobedience he fell under the curse of the law, which doubtless existed, and was in full force from the creation, in respect of its essential requirements: and the event sufficiently proves, that all Adam's posterity were interested in that transaction, and fell with him; for it is an undeniable fact, that men are universally prone to break the law of God, and universally liable to pain, suffering, and death. All that truly believe the Bible, will rest satisfied with the scriptural account of this mysterious subject: others will never be able to account for the state of the world on any principles that are more rational: and the proper answer to those, who object to an evident fact, as inconsistent with divine justice, wisdom, and goodness, has been already given by the apostle, "Nay but, O man, who art thou, that "repliest against God?"

But our situation, as sinners, in this present world, will not here be considered so much as the effect of Adam's sin, as of our personal transgressions: for, whatever we might argue concerning those "who have not sinned after "the similitude of Adam's transgression," by willingly and knowingly preferring their own inclinations to God's express commandment; such as are capable of reading this essay, will hardly pretend that they have never once sinned in this manner. It is evident that "it is appointed "to all men once to die;" the sentence "dust ye are, and "to dust ye shall return," overtakes every one: no vigour, power, wisdom, learning, wealth, efforts, or virtue, can rescue any man from this common lot of our fallen race: only two exceptions have hitherto been made to the general rule; no more are to be expected till the coming of Christ; and few have ever been so absurd as to think of eluding, or overcoming, this universal conqueror. But "after death is the judgment:" and though few are willing to believe the solemn truth: yet it would have been found equally impossible for any sinner to escape condemnation, at that decisive season; had not mercy brought in another hope by Jesus Christ.

If we judge of dispositions and actions by the holy law of God, we shall not long be able even to doubt but that all men are born in sin, and by nature propense to evil and averse to do good. "That which is born of the flesh, is flesh;" and the carnal mind, which is natural to us, is "enmity against God" (Rom. viii. 5—9.) It is the universal law of the whole creation, that every plant or animal possesses the properties of that, from which it was derived. When Adam became a sinner, he begat sons "in his own "likeness:" that which the Creator had pronounced very good, soon became very bad; "the imagination of men's "hearts were only evil continually," "the earth was filled "with violence" and wickedness, and so it evidently continues to this day. If men argue, that all this results from the education, habit, and example; we might inquire how it came to pass, that bad education, examples, and habits became so general, if the nature of man be not bad also? But the impossibility, in the ordinary course of things, of "bringing a clean thing out of an unclean," shows us how the world comes to be so full of all vice and wickedness.

It must be allowed by all observing and impartial persons, that men in general, in all parts of the earth, are very different, in their dispositions and conduct, to what the law of God requires them to be. It is also most certain, that they are liable to a vast variety of miseries and pains; that anxiety, vexation, disappointment, and dissatisfaction are inseparable from earthly condition, pursuit, possession, and connexion; that life itself is short and uncertain; that the approach and stroke of death must always be accompanied with grievous sufferings, if not with terror and dismay; that every earthly pursuit and enjoyment must shortly be thus terminated; and that the body, (however active, vigorous, comely, pampered, or decorated it may now be,) must then be consigned to the dark and noisome tomb, there to moulder to original dust. All this would be very gloomy and dreary, even if it could be certainly known that nothing further was to be apprehended: but a future state of righteous retribution must exceedingly enhance the horror of the prospect, to such persons as are condemned at the bar of their own consciences. The expectation of a future state seems congenial to the human mind: and the arguments of various kinds, which have been urged in proof of the immortality of the soul, and other doctrines connected with it, are so cogent, as to evince such expectations to be the result of serious reflection, and not the offspring of credulity, superstition, or imposture: nay, facts manifestly show, that no ingenuity or efforts can wholly erase the idea, even from the minds of such persons, as are most deeply interested, and most earnestly desirous, to find it a mere groundless imagination.

But this expectation of a future state is too vague and confused, to answer the practical purposes of that doctrine. The ignorance of men in general concerning the character, commands, and government of God, united to the self-flattery that is natural to us all, preserves them in great measure from that terror, which the thoughts of a future judgment, if considered apart from the gospel of Jesus Christ, must otherwise inspire; so that the more men know of God, and of themselves, the greater horror will be associated with the prospect of death and judgment; except it be dispelled by "peace and joy in believing" (Rom. xv. 13)

The immortality of the soul, the resurrection of the body, a future judgment, and a state of righteous retribution, are doctrines most evidently confirmed to us by "the sure testimony of God;" and so clear and explicit are the Scriptures on these topics, that scarcely any thing, but the consciousness of such conduct as weakens the hope of eternal felicity, connected with reluctance to admit the dread of eternal misery, seems sufficient to induce men to deny or argue against the real eternity of that state which commences at death, and shall be confirmed and completed at the day of judgment; whilst the absurdity of reasoning against the justice or goodness of those things which God hath done, or declared he will do, seems the summit of man's pride, presumption, and folly. The Greeks were a speculating people, and could not but have the idea of duration without end, which is all the idea of eternity to which we can attain: the strongest words in that copious language are employed by the sacred writers on this subject; and I apprehend, that the expression translated for ever and ever, always means eternal in the strictest sense of that word. He however that shall make the trial, will scarcely find more energetic phrases in the whole compass of the Greek language as authorized by the example of ancient writers, to express the idea of eternal misery, than are to be found in the New Testament. The very words are used on this awful subject, by which the eternity of heavenly felicity, and the eternal existence of God are expressed, and in the same manner: the repeated declarations concerning the wicked that "their worm never dieth," (which must denote eternal consciousness and self-reflection;) that "their fire shall never be quenched; " with the words "eternal punishment," "the blackness " of darkness for ever," most obviously imply this alarming doctrine. It may hereafter be shown, that sinful creatures must continue guilty and polluted, yea, must increase in evil propensities and multiply crimes to all eternity, whatever they suffer; unless they are changed by an exertion of almighty power, and pardoned by an act of free mercy. Not the most remote hint is given through the whole Scriptures, that mercy or grace will be vouchsafed to any who die in their sins, or that God will ever annihilate his rebellious creatures; but every thing warrants the opposite conclusion. It evidently answers the purpose of the enemies of our souls, and forwards their work of temptation and destruction, to persuade men that they will not be finally miserable, though they continue impenitent and indulge their lusts till death: and the folly and madness of those who profess to believe the Bible to be the word of God; yet sin on, in hopes of finding all the denunciations false or unmeaning, which it contains to this effect, and who bolster up their own and other men's presumption with vain reasonings and sophistical arguments, is great beyond expression.

Our sentiments will not alter the purposes of God: it is therefore as irrational as uncandid to charge those with want of sensibility, compassion, or philanthropy, who explain such Scriptures in their most obvious meaning; and who warn and persuade men by "the terror of the Lord," to repent and seek the salvation of Christ. If several persons were fast asleep in a house that was on fire, we should best express our compassion for them, by alarming them speedily and even violently, and so forwarding their escape; not by leaving them to sleep on, lest they should be too much terrified. They who really believe that all impenitent and unbelieving sinners will be for ever miserable, suppose such men to be in a condition infinitely more tremendous than the persons alluded to; and they cannot but endeavour to convince them of their danger, ere it be too late; the more they love them, the greater will be their earnestness in warning them to “flee from the wrath to come;” and they often show their philanthropy by spending their time in incessant labours, and by distributing their property to relieve the miseries of mankind; and sometimes by laying down their lives for their good.

We may also observe, that the Scripture uniformly speaks of two ways, two descriptions of men, and two places to which they are removed at death, and never intimates a middle path, state, or character, though there be degrees both of happiness and misery; nor does it mention any alteration in the condition either of the righteous or the wicked; except as the resurrection will re-unite their bodies to their souls, and display to the whole world the justice and mercy of God in his dealings with them. All purgatories, therefore, whether before or after the day of judgment, are wholly unscriptural; all reasonings on this subject are vain and presumptuous attempts to remove “the great gulph which God hath fixed;” calculated to take men off from preparing seriously for that day, when “the wicked shall go away into eternal punishment, and the righteous into everlasting life.”

It appears, therefore, that every man lies under a two-fold condemnation for his sins; he is sentenced to various temporal sufferings to be terminated by death; and to eternal misery in another world; and if any one should object to this, on the supposition that his sins do not merit so tremendous a punishment; I would inquire whether human legislators and judges ever think the criminals themselves competent to decide on the equity of their statutes and decisions? Or whether we indeed are capable of determining the degree of evil, contained in rebellion against the authority of the infinite Creator; and what punishment the glory of his name, and the everlasting advantage of the whole creation, may require him to inflict upon transgressors? In respect of the former part of this sentence, alleviations and respites alone can be expected; but we may hope for the entire abolition of the latter; as we live under a dispensation of mercy, through the great mediator of the new covenant. On this salvation we may hereafter enlarge; at present it suffices to say with the Psalmist, "If thou, Lord, should mark iniquities, O Lord, who shall stand! but there is forgiveness with thee, that thou mayest be feared."

The inevitable certainty of death, the uncertainty of the time and manner in which each person shall die; with the manifold troubles and sorrows of life, the turbulency of the passions, the remorse and terrors, and the anguish of the closing scene, of wicked men, bear no faint resemblance to the confinement, chains, and tortures of a condemned criminal, terminating only in his execution. The miseries, which they occasion to each other, aptly represent those scenes, that meet the observation of such persons as are conversant with prisons; in which wretched men have little relief from the anguish of their own minds, except in reproaching and plaguing their companions in guilt; while the dissipated, sensual, and noisy pleasure, by which at times they stun reflection, and excite transient turbulent joy, resembles the drunken carousals of the criminals singing and dancing in their chains, and the infatuated levity of some of them even to the very moment of execution. But the believer has another prospect opened to his view; he is indeed a criminal, but he is pardoned and reconciled to his prince; a few days he must abide in his prison, previously to his regular discharge; but when the other criminals shall be led to execution, he will not only be set at liberty, but admitted to the presence and full favour of his gracious Benefactor, ennobled with the greatest dignities, and enriched beyond expression. In the mean time, the hopes and earnestness of such felicity support and solace his mind, and he knows amidst his pains and sorrows, that "blessed is he, whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose sins are covered."

The uncertain continuance of this vain life is the space allotted us, by the long-sufferings of our offended God, to seek the reversal of that sentence which relates to our final condemnation. To direct our course in this important pursuit, "unto us are committed the oracles of God;" "which are able to make us wise unto salvation by faith in "Jesus Christ." Information, counsels, invitations, warnings, and promises suited to our case, are there given us; means of grace are appointed, in which we may apply for every needful blessing; and especially the Holy Spirit is promised to all, who humbly depend on his gracious teaching, sanctifying, and comforting influences, and seek these blessings by earnest prayer; so that no man, (whatever his sins may be,) can come short of this salvation; provided he apply for it in the appointed way, and with a diligence suited to its inestimable value. This is the situation of every man, so long as life continues; for that judicial blindness and obduracy, to which many are given up, consists in a total and final neglect, contempt, or abuse of this salvation. But when death removes a man out of this world; his opportunity is passed, and his state fixed to all eternity.

We are then criminals, reprieved for a short and uncertain time by the mercy of our Prince; that we may have an opportunity of casting ourselves on his clemency, and seeking forgiveness in a way which for his own glory he hath prescribed. If we avail ourselves of this advantage, the more terrible part of our punishment will be remitted, and the remainder counterbalanced by most animating hopes and consolations, sanctified to our greatest good, and soon terminating in everlasting felicity; but if we neglect so great salvation, our vain and vexatious worldly pursuits and pleasures will soon issue in final and eternal misery.

Our first great business and interest therefore, during our present uncertain state, must be to prepare for death and judgment by seeking "eternal life, as the gift of God "through Jesus Christ our Lord:" for if we succeed in this grand concern, all inferior disappointments or losses will shortly be most amply made up to us ; but if we fail in this respect, our present successes will only serve to aggravate our future anguish. Every pursuit which is incompatible with this primary interest, must be madness and ruin, however fashionable, reputable, lucrative, or agreeable it may otherwise be. Not only inferior elegancies, distinctions and honours, but even crowns and sceptres, the splendour of courts, the councils of statesmen and senators, the grand concerns of empires, yea, “ all the “ kingdoms of the world, and all the glory of them,” dwindle into utter insignificancy, and fade as a withering flower, when compared with eternal happiness or misery ; “ For what is a man profited, if he gain the whole world “ and lose his own soul ?” The soul of man bearing the natural image of God in its noble powers and faculties ; capable of being renewed to his moral image “ righteousness and true holiness ;” endued with the capacity of most exquisite pleasure, or most inconceivable anguish, and formed to subsist in happiness or misery, through the countless ages of eternity, is lost when the favour and image of God are finally forfeited ; and when it is condemned to endure his tremendous wrath, and to be given up to the unrestrained fury of all vile affections in the company of fallen spirits for evermore. This loss is incurred by sin ; but the forfeiture is ratified by the sinner’s persevering impenitence, unbelief, and disobedience. The pleasure, profit, honour, power, or ease, which men seek by continuing in sin, is the price of their souls : they are so infatuated, as thus to sell them for the most worthless trifles ; because, (like our first parents,) they credit Satan’s lies more than the truth of God, through desire of the forbidden fruit ; or because they put off the grand concern to a future season, and quiet their consciences, (as debtors do their importunate creditors,) by fixing on some future time of intended amendment ; or because they think their state good, when God’s word declares the contrary. Thus their opportunity elapses, and too late they understand the energy of the question, “ what shall a man give in exchange for his soul ?”

This shows us the importance of our Lord's exhortation, "Seek first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness." Admission into that kingdom, which God hath set up among men by the gospel of his Son, the privileges of which consist in "righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost;" the holiness and blessings of that kingdom for ourselves, and the peace, prosperity, and enlargement of it in the world, should be sought by diligence in all appointed means, as our grand objects, with the first and best of our time and affections, in preference to all other things, and with a willingness to venture, or part with, whatever comes in competition with them; even if that should be our estates, liberty, friends, or life itself. We are not allowed "to fear even them who can only kill the body, and after that have no more that they can do;" when this would lead us to incur the displeasure of Almighty God, "who is able to destroy both body and soul in hell." A proper attention to our worldly business and interests is a part of our duty to the Lord, to his church, to the community, and to our families; every thing lawful and expedient may thus be rendered subservient to our grand object; and all things needful will be added to us. But men are ruined by reversing God's order, and seeking first the world, and the things that are in the world, even "the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life."

Even where gross vices and open ungodliness are avoided, how greatly are persons of all ranks, endowments, and professions, "careful and troubled about many things;" instead of attending simply and diligently to the one thing needful, and decidedly "choosing that good part, which could never be taken from them." Men's thoughts, contrivances, hopes, fears, joys, sorrows, maxims, wisdom, assiduity, and conversation, are almost wholly engrossed by the perishing vexatious trifles of time. Every vague, strange, and uninteresting report is more attended to, than "the glad tidings of salvation;" every science deemed better worth cultivating than the knowledge of God; every question is thought to be sufficiently important to set the ingenuity of men at work to give it a satisfactory answer, except it be inquired "what we must do to be saved?" And such topics only excite astonishment, disgust, a short silence, and the starting of some more congenial subject! If a man pretend to teach others the way to health, to riches, to the enjoyment of life, or how to appear to advantage among their companions; assiduous attention and liberal compensation will not be withheld: but they, who would teach men the way of eternal life, must not expect much regard even when they desire no other recompense.

But time and room would fail, should we attempt to enumerate the proofs of man's folly and madness in this respect. Even the very messages of God, respecting judgment, eternity, and his great salvation, (instead of meeting with a serious regard,) are often set to music, and profanely employed to vary the species of pleasurable dissipation! Nay, they are often preached out of ostentation, avarice, envy, or strife; heard as a matter of curiosity or amusement; or contended for in pride, virulence, and furious anger! The grand business of most men seems to be, to avoid the burden of reflection, to cause time to glide away as imperceptibly as possible, and so apparently to shorten the span allotted them to prepare for eternity! Well might the Psalmist then say, "Rivers of water run down mine eyes, because men keep not thy law."—But, O ye giddy sons and daughters of Adam! what will ye think of your present pursuits when death shall summon you to God's tribunal? What will then your riches, pleasures, decorations, elegancies, honours, or dignities, avail you? What comfort will the knowledge of all languages and sciences then afford? What will you think of your present anxious cares, covetings, envyings, repinings, and disputes; when "the night cometh in which no man can work?" "Seek," then, "the Lord while he may be found, call upon him while he is near; let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts, and let him return to the Lord, and he will have mercy upon him; and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon."

ESSAY VI.

On the Deity of Christ.

THE doctrine of a Mediator, through whom a just and Holy God deals mercifully with believers, is the grand peculiarity of revelation: it must, therefore, be of the greatest importance for us to form a proper estimate of the personal dignity of this Mediator. The doctrine which I shall here attempt to establish from Scripture, may be thus stated: ‘ That Jesus Christ is truly and really God, one with
‘ and equal to the Father; being from eternity possessed
‘ of all divine perfections, and justly entitled to all divine honours; yet personally distinct from the Father,
‘ and so called his own Son, and his only begotten Son.
‘ But that in order to the performance of his mediatorial office, he assumed our nature into personal union
‘ with the Deity, became One with us, truly man, like us
‘ in all things, sin alone excepted; and that he is thus God
‘ and Man in one mysterious incomprehensible Person:
‘ so that all the fulness of the Godhead dwells in him bodily.’

No argument can properly be brought against the doctrine of our Lord’s essential Deity, as here stated, from those Scriptures which speak of his human nature, his mediatorial office, or his inferiority to the Father in both these respects; for our doctrine implies this, and even absolutely requires it. An ambassador, though subordinate by office to his prince, is not supposed to be of an inferior nature, or of inferior abilities to him. We need not therefore discourse on this part of the subject; it is generally allowed by all, except Deists and Atheists, that “ Christ is “ come in the flesh;” though numbers contend that he could not have come in any other way; which renders the language of inspiration unmeaning, if not absurd; while others deem him a mere creature of some supra-angelic nature, and only called God in consequence of his mediatorial exaltation. But the idea of a creature, however exalted, being advanced to divinity, is so repugnant to all rational principles, as well as to the declarations of Jehovah, that "he knows no God besides himself, and will not give his glory to another;" that it will not be necessary to discuss the subject before us with any particular reference to these distinct opinions; as it fully answers the purpose, if we can evince that our Redeemer is by nature "God over all blessed for evermore." At present I shall adduce a few select arguments, in direct proof of this point; leaving some other things that belong to the subject, to be discussed in the subsequent essay.

I. The reader will naturally turn his thoughts to those Scriptures, in which Jesus Christ is expressly called GOD, and LORD. "Without controversy," says the Apostle, "great is the mystery of godliness, God was manifest in the flesh.*" He not only allows his doctrine to be very mysterious, but even appears to glory in it as "the great mystery of godliness;" and it could not be controverted nor denied that it was a great mystery. We may therefore be sure, that they who would so interpret the words, as to render his doctrine scarcely mysterious at all, do not understand them: but all they who suppose him to mean that Jesus was Emmanuel, God with us; that the child born at Bethlehem was the mighty God, as the prophet foretold; consider his proposition both as a great mystery, and as the source, centre, and support of godliness †. It would be superfluous in this brief attempt, to do more than refer the reader to the well known passages to this effect ‡, and to intreat him to read with attention as the word of God, and with earnest prayer to be enabled to understand and believe them: for it seems impossible for human language to express any sentiment more strongly than they do the Deity of Christ. “He, who was in the beginning “ with God, and was God, who made all things,” so that “ without him was not any thing made that was made ;”

 “ by whom, and for whom, all things were created, and by “ whom all things consist,” and who “ upholds all things
 “ by the word of his power,” must be “ God over all, bles“ sed for evermore ;” for “ he that made all things is “ God,” which surely none but an avowed Atheist will deny.

These and several other passages of this kind, will come again under consideration towards the close of this essay : and this first argument may be concluded by intreating the reader to consider what the Apostle could mean by saying “ The second man is the Lord from heaven*,” if Christ be only a mere man or a created being ?

II. Several texts of the Old Testament concerning Jehovah, are applied in the New to Christ. The prophet declares, “ that whosoever shall call on the name of Jehovah “ shall be delivered :” and the Apostle expressly refers this to Christ †: for he adds “ how shall they call on him “ of whom they have not heard? or how shall they “ hear without a preacher ?” It is manifest, that Joel predicted the judgments which awaited the Jews for rejecting the Messiah ‡: certainly they did very earnestly call upon Jehovah, the God of their fathers to deliver them from the power of the Romans : yet they were not delivered, because they would not join with those who called on the name of Jesus ; and they only who called on him were saved. As therefore the Scripture cannot be broken, Christ must be Jehovah ; Paul considered him as such, and the event demonstrated him to be so.—The Psalmist says “ Taste and see, that Jehovah is good ;” to this the Apostle manifestly refers when he uses these words, “ If so be, “ ye have tasted that the Lord is gracious—to whom com“ ing as to a living stone, &c.” and in what follows the attentive reader will perceive, that he applies to Christ in the most unreserved manner, what the Prophet had spoken of "Jehovah, God of hosts himself *."—Isaiah had a most extraordinary vision of Jehovah in his temple; and the Evangelist declares that "he then saw the glory of Christ, "and spake of him †."—Paul applies to Christ's coming to judgment what the same Prophet had written of Jehovah swearing by himself, that "every knee should bow to "him, and every tongue confess to God ‡:" Indeed the whole passage referred to, especially the last verse, "In "Jehovah shall all the seed of Israel be justified, and shall "glory," proves that Emmanuel was especially meant, in whom alone believers are justified and glory §. Instances of this kind might be easily multiplied, did not brevity forbid: but I would rest the argument principally on those which follow. Jehovah, speaking to Moses, declared his self-existent, immutable, and eternal Deity, by saying, I AM THAT I AM; and ordered him to inform Israel "that I AM had sent him to them:" This Christ expressly applied to himself, when he said to the Jews, "Before "Abraham was, I AM." Had he said 'before Abraham 'was, I was,' it would sufficiently have proved his pre-existence to all who believe him to be Truth, or to speak truth: but we cannot affix any meaning to the words, as they now stand, unless we allow Him to be the eternal God. This his enemies of old clearly perceived, and therefore they went about to stone him for blasphemy: nor can they who deem him only a man fairly dissent from the verdict; however it may be convenient to them to palliate the language in question. Should we render the words "I AM "HE;" they are then equivalent to those of Jehovah, "Before the day was I AM HE ||;" and the use of the present tense, with reference to Abraham who lived so many ages before, perfectly discriminates this passage from all others, in which the same expression is used either by our Lord or any other person ¶. Indeed the language of the passage in Exodus, and that of Luke concerning it*, lead us to consider the eternal Son, the great Angel of the covenant, as speaker on this occasion; and whoever attentively compares the appearances of Jehovah to Abraham, Moses, Joshua, Gideon, and many others; with the words of the Evangelist, “No man hath seen God at any time, the only begotten Son—hath declared him;” will be apt to conclude that all these were discoveries of that very person in the form of God, who afterwards appeared in the form of a servant.—Again, Isaiah introduces Jehovah, saying, “I am the first and I am the last; and besides me there is no God.” This Christ, appearing in vision to John, expressly and repeatedly claimed to himself. “Fear not, I am the first and the last: I am he that liveth and was dead, and am alive for evermore †.” How can any reasonable man suppose, that Jesus, had he been no more than a mere creature, would have used such language of himself, and appropriated the very words by which Jehovah declared his own eternal power and Godhead ‡? Finally, Jehovah claims it as his prerogative “to search the hearts, and try the reins:” and Christ most emphatically says, “and all the churches shall know that I am He, which searcheth the reins and hearts §.” Did any holy Being ever use such language? Or would the holy Jesus, if he had not been One with, and Equal to, the eternal Father?

III. We may next consider some things, which Christ spoke of himself, or his disciples concerning him, as manifest proofs of his Deity. “Destroy,” says he, “this temple, and in three days I will raise it up again: but he spake of the temple of his body ||.” Not to insist on the appropriate sense in which he called his body a temple, as the immediate residence of his Deity; I would inquire whether it be not an act of divine power to raise the dead? whether any mere man ever raised his own body, after he had been violently put to death? and whether God did not actually raise again the man Christ Jesus? The obvious answer to these questions will evince, that Christ had a nature distinct from his manhood; that He was truly God, as one with the Father; that He had “power to lay down his life, and power to take it again;” and that by so doing he proved himself to be the Son of God, in that sense which the Jews deemed blasphemy: for that was the crime alleged against him, and which they supposed to be blasphemy by their law*.—Again, “I will,” saith Christ to his disciples, “give you a mouth and wisdom; which none of your enemies shall be able to gainsay, or resist:” Now who can give a mouth and wisdom but God only †. Did any mere man or holy creature ever advance such a claim, or induce others to form such expectations from him? Yet according to this promise, the evangelist says, “Then opened he their understandings to understand the Scriptures ‡.—To Nicodemus, who was astonished at his discourse on regeneration, he said, “If I have told you earthly things, and ye believe not, how shall ye believe, if I tell you of heavenly things? And no man hath ascended into heaven, but that came down from heaven, even the Son of Man who is in heaven §?” But in what sense could the Son of man be said “to come down from heaven, and at the same time to be in heaven,” even when he was speaking on earth, if there had not been such an intimate union between the man Christ Jesus, and the Word, which “in the beginning was with God, and was God,” that what belonged to the one nature, might properly be said of the other? Thus it is said that “God purchased the church with his own blood;” because He, who shed his blood, was God as well as man. In like manner, “the Son of Man was in heaven,” because that Person, whose omnipresence filled the heavens, was also the Son of Man; and this was doubtless a specimen of those heavenly things, which are far more mysterious than regeneration.—The same conclusions may undeniably be drawn from our Lord's words, when he says, "Where two or three are gathered together in my Name, there am I in the midst of you;" and, "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world*." These are certainly equivalent to the promises of Jehovah in the Old Testament, that he would be with his people in all their trials; and can by no ingenuity be separated from the attribute of omnipresence; for Christ, as man, is in heaven, and not personally present with his ministers and congregations,—“No one,” says he, “knoweth who the Son is, but the Father; neither knoweth any one who the Father is, save the Son, and he to whom the Son will reveal him †.” Can any man deny this to be an assertion, that the Son is equally incomprehensible with the Father; and a declaration that all knowledge of God is erroneous, which is not learned by faith in him?

When he was called to account, (probably before the sanhedrim,) for healing on the Sabbath day ‡; he answered “My Father worketh hitherto, and I work;” and the Jews considered this as a declaration, that, “God was his own Father,” and as “making himself equal with God.” His subsequent discourse, in which he stated his union of counsel and operation with the Father, and often referred to his human nature and mediatorial undertaking, has been frequently misunderstood: but surely He who spoke of “quickening whom he would,” of “having life in himself,” and of being “honoured by all men, even as they honoured the Father that sent him,” cannot be thought to have objected to the inference, which had been drawn from his first assertion.—In like manner, when he had said, “I and my Father are One,” one Being or Deity, (θεος, numen,) and the Jews charged him with blasphemy, “because being a man he made himself God;” his answer, which concludes thus, “that ye may know, and believe, “that I am in the Father, and the Father in me,” could not be intended as a denial of their allegation; though we should allow that he waved the further discussion of the subject, by referring to the language of Scripture concerning magistrates as types of the Messiah. The Jews at least did not so understand him; for they renewed their attempts to seize and stone him as a blasphemer*. It would not consist with brevity to consider particularly our Lord’s words to Martha, “I am the resurrection and the “Life,” &c.; his reply to Philip, “He that hath seen me, “hath seen the Father.—I am in the Father, and the Father in me,” with other expressions of his last discourse with his disciples. “They have both seen and hated both “me, and my Father”—“All things that the Father hath “are mine”—“Glorify thou me with thine ownself, with “the glory, which I had with thee before the world was. “All mine,” (in the neuter gender, implying all things, as well as all persons,) “are thine, and thine are mine,” and others of similar import †. If Christ be no more than a man, or a created being, such language can only serve to perplex a plain subject, and mislead a simple reader: and it is evident that much learning, ingenuity, and labour are required to put any plausible sense upon it, when his Deity is denied.

But our Lord’s repeated promises of sending the “Holy Spirit, to convince the world of sin, righteousness, and judgment,” “to glorify him,” and to teach and comfort his disciples, require a more particular consideration. Without anticipating the subject of a future Essay, on the Deity and Personality of the Holy Spirit, we may assert without hesitation, that such promises could not properly have been given by any mere servant of God. The Holy Spirit must denote either a divine person, or the one living and true God operating in a peculiar manner on the minds of men: and is it not palpably absurd to suppose, that any mere creature should direct, or send, the Spirit of God, in either of these senses? The Believer's union with Christ, and with the Father through him, has sometimes been considered as coincident with our Lord's union with the Father; but can it be thought, that any Christian is one with God in such a sense, that the Holy Spirit may as properly be called his Spirit, as the Spirit of God? Yet He is frequently called the Spirit of Christ, as sent by and proceeding from him*. Indeed the words of Christ, by which the promise of the Spirit is introduced, are very remarkable; "Whatsoever ye ask in my name, I will do it †!"

The language of his disciples should also be noticed. They repeatedly observe, "that he knew the thoughts of men:" and John expressly says, that "he knew all men; and needed not that any should testify of man, for he knew what was in man.‡" If this were not an undeniable ascription of omniscience; yet Peter certainly appealed to that divine attribute without any reserve, when he said, "Lord, thou knowest all things, thou knowest that "I love thee §." The attentive reader of the Evangelists will observe for himself many expressions of a similar nature, which are never used of Prophets, of Apostles, or Angels: these serve to show us what the disciples thought of their Lord. Thus John remarks, that by his miracles "he manifested forth his glory:" whereas all other Prophets and Saints referred all their works to the glory of God alone ||.

The testimony of John Baptist is peculiarly important in this inquiry. "He was filled with the Holy Ghost from his mother's womb;" being, more than a "prophet," and "great in the sight of the Lord above all that had been born of a woman ¶." Yet he deemed himself "unworthy to loose the Redeemer's shoe latchet:” he declared, that “of his fulness he and all” his fellow servants “had received,” that “he needed to be baptized of him,” and that “Christ came from heaven, and was above all.” And though Jesus was the younger man, yet John assigned as the reason why he was preferred before him, “that he was before him,” which is absolutely decisive in respect of his pre-existence*. To such a degree did this most excellent servant of God abase himself, and exalt the Saviour! and in this he was a perfect contrast to those, who manifestly exalt themselves and degrade Him. The words of Gabriel to Zacharias concerning John are also very remarkable; “Many of the children of Israel shall he turn to the Lord their God, and he shall go before Him,” (even before the Lord his God,) “in the spirit and power of Elias.” John was the forerunner of Christ, and was sent to prepare his way before him: who then can doubt, but the angel considered the Messiah, (that was about to appear as Emmanuel,) to be the Lord God of Israel? This the prophets had foretold, and one of them calls the Messiah, the Angel of the Covenant, Jehovah †. We find JEHOVAH OF HOSTS repeatedly saying to another prophet, “thou shalt know that JEHOVAH OF HOSTS hath sent me to thee ‡. And when the word became flesh, and tabernacled among men,” all his true disciples “saw his glory; the glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth §.”

IV. The works, which Christ hath undertaken, or performed, evince his Deity. He, “who created all things, and upholds them by the word of his power,” “came a Light into the world,” “to be the Light of the world,” and to “enlighten every man that cometh into the world ||.” That eternal Life which was with the Father, was manifested to be the life of men ¶. He hath engaged to give eternal life to all his true disciples, notwithstanding the opposition of their enemies; to prepare mansions in heaven for them; to receive them to himself; to raise the dead by his word; to judge the whole world; and to destroy all his adversaries “with everlasting destruction, from his presence and from the glory of his power,” by which “he is able even to subdue all things unto himself* :” and can any thing except omnipotence and omniscience fulfil these engagements?—The Apostle speaks of Christians, as “looking for the glorious appearance of the great God, and our Saviour Jesus Christ:” (Tit. ii. 13.) now the great God will not appear at the day of judgment, in his Essence, (for no man hath seen nor can see him:) but Christ will appear as the great God our Saviour and Judge, in his own glory as Mediator, and in the glory of the Father; exercising all divine perfections with sovereign authority before the whole world: and indeed his language respecting that decisive season is uniformly majestic beyond expression, as every attentive reader must perceive. He is likewise “exalted to give repentance;” he is “the Author and Finisher of faith;” and even, when he “was in the form of a servant.” “he had power on earth to forgive sins.” “He has the keys of death and the invisible world:” “Angels, principalities, and powers are subject to him;” nay, they are “the angels of his power;” and “all creatures serve him.”—Who then is this “Son of David?” Is he not “the Son of God?” Is he not the Root, as well as the Offspring, of David? who for that reason, “in Spirit called him his Lord,” many ages before he became his Son? for He is “the Lord of all,” “the Lord of Glory,” and “the Prince of life.”

It must be evidently absurd to ascribe all this to a derived and delegated power; for how can omnipotence, omniscience, or omnipresence be communicated, or exercised by a mere creature? But indeed Jehovah expressly declares, that “He made all things by himself ;” and “will “not give his glory to another;” and that “there is no God and Saviour besides Him.” (Is. xliii. 10. 11. xliv. 8. 24.) The manner likewise in which Christ wrought his miracles, in general without the least appearance of relying on any power but his own, was very different from that of Prophets or Apostles: for while they took great care to have it understood, that they were merely the instruments of him in whose name they spoke, lest honour should be ascribed to them; he authoritatively issued his mandates in his own name, evidently wrought by his own power, and manifested forth his own glory.

V. This appears still more conclusively in the behaviour of our Lord towards those who honoured him. The servants of God have always decidedly refused every kind and degree of honour shown them, which seemed to interfere with the glory of God; and the Scriptures referred to, must put this beyond all doubt*: yet it is obvious, that Jesus did not object to similar honours; nay, that he most honoured those, who “thus honoured him †;” and approved of men in exact proportion as they had high thoughts of him and large expectations from him. Nor is there a single exception to this rule in his whole history; for his answer to the young ruler, who called him “good Teacher,” was in fact an intimation that he did not think highly enough of him, and misapplied the epithet good to one whom he deemed a mere man like himself.—When the centurion compared his power over all diseases, even in such persons as were at a distance, to his own authority over his soldiers and servants; Christ highly commended the greatness of his faith ‡.—When the afflicted parent besought him “to help his unbelief:” and when the disciples desired him “to increase their faith;” no intimation was given that their language was improper: but who can believe that apostles would have approved of such requests being made to them *?—He received without reserve that prostration, or worship, against which Prophets, Apostles, and Angels, resolutely protested when paid to them †: and when various opinions were formed of him, he always best approved of those that thought most highly of him, and even suggested still more exalted apprehensions of his glory ‡. Now how can we account for this? Must we not conclude, either that the servants were more humble, and more jealous of the glory of God, than his beloved Son: or that Christ was conscious, “all men ought to honour Him, even as they honoured the Father?” for it is manifest that he readily accepted of those honours, which they most strenuously rejected.

VI. The undeniable instances of divine worship paid to Christ constitute another most conclusive argument. Worship, (properly so called,) is an ascription of the peculiar honours of the Deity to any Being. To supplicate a creature, though visibly present, for those blessings which God alone can bestow, is idolatry; because omnipotence is ascribed to a creature. And it is the same to pray to any being, when not sensibly present, even for such deliverances as a creature might afford: because it ascribes to that creature omnipresence, or omniscience; which proves all the prayers of Papists to Saints and Angels to be idolatry. The petitions beforementioned, for “increase of faith,” were acts of worship paid to Christ: as was the address of Thomas, “My Lord and my God:” nor would any holy man or Angel have received them—The form of baptism, “in the name of the Father, the Son, and the holy Ghost,” must be considered as an appointed adoration of the Son, and Holy Spirit, equally with the Father; or we must admit the greatest absurdities.—No doubt Stephen worshipped Christ when he prayed to him to receive his spirit, and not to impute his death to his murderers: or on similar grounds we might deny

Christ's own prayers to the same effect, when he hung on the cross, to be an adoration of the Father*.—What candid person can deny, that Paul addressed Christ, concerning “the thorn in his flesh; for when the Lord answered, that “his grace was sufficient for him,” he even “gloried in his infirmities, that the power of Christ might “rest upon him †?” Did he not pray to Christ when he said “now God himself and our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ, direct our way unto you?” And “now our Lord Jesus Christ himself, and God, even our Father, “comfort your hearts, and establish you in every good word “and work ‡?” Such instances show how familiar it was to the Apostles, “to honour the Son, even as he honoured “the Father;” and as tending to the “glory of God the “Father §.”—The apostolical blessing is an act of worship coincident with that appointed by Moses ||; yet Christ and the Holy Spirit are joined in it; and doubtless he was prayed to, whenever “grace and peace,” (the sum of all spiritual blessings,) were sought “from God our Father, “and from our Lord Jesus Christ.” Indeed it was the grand peculiarity of Christians, that “they called on the “name of the Lord Jesus ¶;” and those who have attempted to interpret such expressions in some other sense, do as little credit to their critical talents as to their orthodoxy. Not to multiply instances, to which some possible objection might be made; the words of Peter ** are incapable of any other construction. “Grow in grace and in the “knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ; to “him be glory both now and for ever, Amen.”

As all the Angels of God were commanded to worship his incarnate Son; so, when a door was opened in heaven, the whole angelic host is introduced as joining the company of redeemed sinners, in ascribing eternal honour and praise to “the Lamb that was slain,” in union with “Him that sitteth on the Throne * :” no words can possibly be more emphatical than those used on these occasions. Can any man, therefore, after reading them, assert that Christ is a mere created being? or that it is idolatry to worship him? Or will he pretend to believe that Book to be “the unerring word of God?” or can he disapprove its divine inspiration; when its prophecies have been so remarkably accomplished? This shows that our version is faithful in another place †, and that every Christian ought to join the saints of old, in saying, “Unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood,—be glory and dominion for ever and ever. Amen.”

VII. Lastly, our doctrine is confirmed by the absurdities into which its most able opposers have been driven. Such men have principally laboured to invalidate those texts, that seem most explicit on the subject: though we could prove our doctrine, even if these evidences were set aside. For this reason I have omitted one testimony, which is decisive, if genuine, (as upon the whole I suppose it to be;) because its authenticity has been so much disputed ‡.—A short specimen, however, may show with what success they who deny the Deity of Christ have laboured. The Psalmist, and from him the Apostle says of the Messiah, “Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever ||.” To elude the obvious inference from this text, it hath been said, that the words may be rendered, “God is thy throne for ever and ever.” We read that heaven is God’s throne, and the earth is his footstool; but who can conceive God himself to be the throne, on which a creature should reign to eternity?—Instead of “God was manifest in the flesh;” some would read it, “who was manifested in the flesh;” in which case God must be the antecedent, as the context shows; and then the sense remains precisely the same *. Others would read it “ which (mystery) was manifested in the flesh;” and then which mystery must be the nominative case to all the subsequent clauses in the verse: but whatever may be thought of the other propositions, “ which mystery was received up into glory,” will scarcely be deemed the language of inspiration, by any who do not prefer nonsense to orthodoxy.— But sometimes these persons seem disposed to retain our reading, and to explain the expression to mean, ‘ that the wisdom and power of God were conspicuous in Christ;’ which would be also true of Peter, or Moses; and so this great mystery of godliness at length is found to be no mystery at all!

When incredulous Thomas was at last convinced of Christ’s resurrection, he exclaimed, “ My Lord and my God!” And it cannot seem wonderful to those, who consider that he knew the Messiah was to be called Emmanuel, and had heard him say, “ he that hath seen me, hath seen the Father,” that he should be convinced of his Deity by his resurrection from the dead †. To set aside this testimony, it hath been said, that the Apostle’s words were the language of astonishment, and not of adoration, as men often exclaim, my God, when greatly surprised. But are not such exclamations manifest violations of the third commandment, and certain proofs of men’s irreverent contempt of the name of God? Who then can believe, that the Apostles used such profane language before Christ, without meeting with the least reproof for it ‡? Surely such a solution must be improbable in the highest degree; and they, who can admit it, have no right to despise other men’s credulity! But indeed, the words cannot admit of any such construction, consistently with the idiom of the original language.

That most august passage, with which John opens his gospel, has been so construed, in order to evade our inference from it, that the nominative case to the verbs used in it must be changed again and again, without the least intimation given of it; contrary to all the rules of grammar. By others, the word is supposed to mean nothing more, than the energy or power of God, which was eternally with him and essential to him, by which he made the world, and which was manifested in the man Jesus: but can any one in his senses suppose, that this was all the meaning of the Apostle's introduction to his gospel, of the sublime things he says of the word, and of his becoming flesh and dwelling among us? If any one should think so for a moment, a second attentive perusal must surely convince him of his mistake. Aware of this, it is now deemed convenient to set it aside as no part of revelation!

The interpretation, given of another decisive evidence *, is grounded on a proposed different translation, implying 'that Christ did not think of such a robbery, as that of being equal with God.' But not to mention the various expressions used by our Lord, which certainly were thus understood by the Jews; who can believe that the Apostle should propose to his brethren, as a perfect example of humility, the conduct of a mere man or creature, who barely did not claim equality with the eternal God; when at best this could be no more than an exemption from the very summit of all possible pride and ambition? His argument, (as well as the meaning of the words,) proves that "in the form of God," signifies, being truly God and appearing so; even as the form of a servant and the fashion of a man signify being truly man: and how could a mere creature "take upon him the form of a servant," seeing he must always have been a servant of his Maker?

The Apostle, speaking of the patriarchs, (Rom. ix. 5.) said, "of whom, as concerning the flesh, Christ came, who "is over all God blessed for ever, Amen." To evade this decisive testimony, it has been proposed to render the latter clause, "God be blessed for ever, Amen." But where then is the meaning of the preceding expression, "as con- “cerning the flesh?” Did ever a sensible writer use such language concerning the descent of any prince or hero? Does not the energy and propriety of the passage depend on the contrast between the clauses, “of whom as concerning the flesh Christ came;” and “who is over all God blessed for ever?” And do you not convert it into unmeaning absurdity by such a change in the version?

Stephen’s dying address to Christ has lately been considered, ‘as the words of a man, in an extacy of devotion, or ‘in the agonies of death,’ and therefore not of much weight in the argument; as if modern reasoners could better direct our faith and worship, than this protomartyr, when full of the Holy Ghost, favoured with the visions of God, and replete with the light of Heaven!—“ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ; that though he was rich yet for your sakes he became poor?” What shall we say to Paul’s words *? Could he, who was born in a stable, had not where to lay his head, and died on a cross, be rich before he was poor; if he had not existed before he became a man?—The words of Christ, which his disciples thought so plain, “I came forth from the Father, and am come in to the world; again, I leave the world and go to the Father,” (John xvi. 28.) and many other declarations he made, “that he came down from heaven,” so pressed the ancient Socinians, as to induce them to feign that Jesus, like Mahomet, went to heaven to receive his instructions, previously to his entrance on his ministry. But modern Socinians have given up this figment; they seem conscious of their inability to maintain their old ground; and therefore, they now intimate that Apostles and Evangelists were mistaken, and that several books or parts of the Scripture are not authentic, or not divinely inspired. Thus they save themselves much trouble by answering all our witnesses at once; and doubtless, they act prudently in imitating the church of Rome; constituting themselves judges of the Scriptures, determining what parts of it are divine, and making their own scheme the standard, by which it is to be interpreted; for neither of their systems can subsist, except by a proportionable disregard to and degradation of the word of God.

I feel a confidence, that each of the arguments here adduced, are separately conclusive : how great then must be the united force of them? Yet only a small part of the evidence can be contained in so brief an essay. I would, therefore conclude, with observing, that the Scriptures were written to recover men from idolatry, to the worship of the true God ; and that idolatry consists in worshipping such as by nature are no gods. What then shall we think of all the texts here adduced, if Christ be not God? or what shall we say to John's conclusion of his first epistle? Having mentioned Jesus Christ, he adds, " This person (ουτος) " is the true God, and eternal life. Little children, " keep yourselves from idols." (1 John v. 20, 21.)

ESSAY VII.

Showing the Doctrine of our Lord's Deity to be essential to Christianity; with a brief Answer to some objections.

WE are not in all cases capable of determining exactly what things are essential to our holy religion, and what are not ; yet the Scriptures most evidently declare some particulars to be so ; and I cannot but consider the doctrine of our Lord's Deity as one of these essentials, nor hesitate to say that Christianity itself must stand or fall with it. The greater decision is proper on this subject, as our opponents seem lately to have shifted their ground. ' They used to ' maintain that Christ's divinity was the master-piece of ' absurdities—directly contrary to every part of natural ' and revealed religion, and to all the rational faculties ' God has given us : ' that by making more gods than ' one, it was a breach of the first commandment, and much more to the same purpose. This was a direct charge of gross idolatry, which surely must be a mortal sin; and as the defenders of the doctrine denied, and even retorted the charge, showing that another god is substituted by Socinians in the place of the God of the Bible; the cause was fairly at issue, allowed to be of the greatest possible importance, and entitled to the most careful, serious, and impartial investigation. But at present men are generally put off their guard by the plausible and indolent sentiment, that speculative opinions are of little consequence; and that those who are sincere and lead good lives, will not be condemned for doctrinal errors. And an attempt has lately been made, by a champion of the party *, to persuade a very large body of men, who universally profess the doctrine of Christ's Deity, that there is no essential difference between them and the Socinians! On the other hand, some able defenders of the doctrine seem disposed to allow, that the belief of it is not necessary to salvation, or essential to Christianity; nay, that they who most strenuously oppose it, and not always in the most unexceptionable manner, may notwithstanding be accepted of God as sincere believers. Thus the subject, which used to be considered as of the utmost importance, is now generally thought to be rather a matter of doubtful disputation among Christians, than immediately connected with our eternal interests: and the cause hath more to fear from the indolent and contemptuous indifference of mankind, as to theological questions which are not supposed essential to salvation, than from the most strenuous and ingenious efforts of its very able and learned opponents.

I shall therefore endeavour, in this place, to show, that the doctrine of our Lord's Deity is essential to the faith and hope of a Christian; and this will lead our attention to many arguments in proof of it which were not produced in the former essay.

I. There are several texts of Scripture which expressly decide on the subject. The Lord Jesus himself declares, * Dr. Priestley's address to the Methodists, preface to the Letters of the Wesleys.

that "the Father hath committed all judgment to the Son; that all men should honour the Son, even as they honour the Father; he that honoureth not the Son, honoureth not the Father that sent him*." If the very end of his mediatory authority, as the Son of man, were this, "that all men should honour him" with the same kind and degree of honour that is shown to the Father; and this must be the case if our doctrine be true; then such persons as deny his Deity, refuse to worship him, and spend their lives, with all their ability, influence, and diligence, to draw men off from this faith and worship, do not honour him at all, but greatly degrade him; and, therefore, by the verdict of their future judge, they "do not honour the Father that sent him." So that the Deity of Christ, if true, must be essential to Christianity.—It appears from Scriptures already referred to †, that they have no true knowledge of the Father, who do not receive it from the revelation made of him by the Son; but how can that man be thought to learn the knowledge of the Father from the Son, who disregards his express declarations, that "He and the Father are One," and that, "He that hath seen him hath seen the Father?" If these words do indeed imply the Deity of the Son, as One with the Father; the knowledge of God, which they who deny his Deity possess, cannot accord to the revelation made by the Son, but must be entirely of another nature.—The Apostle likewise expressly says ‡, "Whosoever denieth the Son, the same hath not the Father:" and can any man suppose this related only to a denial that Jesus was the Messiah? If this were all that was meant, then none but avowed unbelievers were concerned in the warning: whereas it is manifest, that the Apostle spoke of those who seduced, not those that opposed, his christian brethren; and who, by denying Jesus to be the Son of God, drew them off from the true doctrine in that particular. As therefore, they, “who denied the Son, had not the Father;” the inference is unavoidable, that they, who deny the scriptural doctrine concerning the Son of God, (whatever this doctrine be,) have not the Father for their God and Portion. Many errors relate to different parts of the structure, the removal of which, (though ill spared,) may not wholly subvert it: but this concerns the foundation, and is of fatal consequence; “for other foundation can no man lay.” (Cor. iii. 10—15.)

The same Apostle gives it as a rule, that the truth was to be known, by its agreement with the doctrine taught by him and his brethren, and that every tenet, however supported, must be a doctrine of Antichrist, which accorded not with what they had taught concerning Christ. “Hereby know ye the Spirit of God: every spirit that confesseth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is of God. And every spirit that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh, is not of God—and this is that spirit of Antichrist.—We are of God; he that knoweth God, heareth us; he that is not of God heareth not us—hereby know we the Spirit of truth, and the spirit of error.” (1 John iv. 2—6.) According to this rule, all pretences to new revelations, and every philosophical reasoning, must be wholly disregarded as springing from the spirit of error, if they contradict the testimony of the Apostles as recorded in the Scriptures; and if this error relate to the Person of Christ, it is of Antichrist. It may be allowed, that by “coming in the flesh,” the reality of our Lord’s human nature was maintained: but who could have doubted that he was really a man, if it had been generally believed that he was no more than a man? If he could not have come otherwise than in the flesh, the Apostle would hardly have made that an essential part of his confession. But the coming of the only begotten Son of God in the flesh, as the anointed King, Priest, and Prophet of the church, was indeed essential to his doctrine; and they who denied it must reject or pervert all the rest.

But indeed some of those heretics, whom John here so strenuously opposed, as the forerunners of the principal Antichrist, were the very persons, whom certain modern Antitrinitarians would persuade us to regard as the only primitive Christians, who retained the faith of the gospel in its original purity!

The Apostle afterwards declares, that the principal testimony of God related to his Son: "If we receive
" the witness of men, the witness of God is greater.
" For this is the witness of God which he testified of " his Son.—He that believeth not God, hath made " him a liar, because he believeth not the record, that " God gave of his Son. And this is the record, that " God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in " his Son. He that hath the Son hath life, and *he that
" hath not the Son of God, hath not life.*" (1 John v. 10—13.)
As the whole of revelation centres in this point, it is vain for a man to pretend that he believes other parts of it, whilst he rejects its principal doctrine. His opinion may indeed accord with the testimony of God in some particulars: he may assent to Scriptural truths, because he thinks they may be otherwise proved; but if his own reasonings, or those of some philosopher, lead to conclusions opposite to the word of God, he hesitates not to treat that as a lie. So that in fact such men do not believe God, but other witnesses, when they assent to scriptural truths: for they treat him as a false witness, when he contradicts their preconceived opinions. It is therefore evident, that no man's belief of the Bible, or of any thing contained in it, can be genuine, whilst he rejects "the testimony which God hath " given of his Son." And this illustrates all those other passages, in which it is declared, that "he that believeth
" not shall be damned;" and that "he who believeth not
" the Son, shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth
" on him:" because it hence appears, that unbelievers treat the truth of God as a lie, and so exclude themselves from that salvation, which is in Christ Jesus, for sinners who by faith apply for an interest in it. For it is plain that a man cannot believe the Son, if he refuse to credit what he says of himself, and concerning his personal dignity and excellency.

The same important caution is again inculcated by this Apostle. "Many deceivers are entered into the world, who confess not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh. This is a deceiver and an Antichrist.—Whosoever transgresseth and abideth not in the doctrine of Christ, hath not God. He that abideth in the doctrine of Christ, he hath both the Father and the Son." (2 John 7—11.) The doctrine of Christ must certainly relate to his Person, either as God and Man, or merely Man. But if he that abode not in that doctrine had not God; and if Christians were forbidden to "receive him into their houses, or bid him God speed," or at all to sanction his delusions; (though they might doubtless have relieved his urgent wants, as an enemy in distress;) it must follow that the doctrine concerning the Person of Christ is essential to Christianity, and a rejection of the true doctrine is an anti-christian departure from the faith. And I appeal to every impartial man to determine, whether such language, if we had first used it, would not have excited the sneer of numbers, and an outcry of bigotry against us.—The reader must observe, that the texts here quoted, are not brought as direct proofs of our Lord's Deity, (though many of them do prove it;) but to show that a right faith in this respect is essential to salvation by Christ: and they doubtless so far establish this point, that those, who treat such questions as immaterial, will find it most convenient wholly to overlook them, or to deny them to be the unerring dictates of the Spirit of truth.

II. The peculiar nature of our Lord's mediation warrants the same conclusion. The office of mediator, between two parties who are at variance, seems to imply, that the person performing it stands in some relation to each party; is likely to take care of the interests of both in an equitable manner; and possesses influence, either from excellency of character, dignity of rank, or services performed, to give weight to his interposition. Now Jesus is Mediator between the great Creator and holy Governor of the universe, and his unholy rebellious creatures; and it is supposed, that there are those things in his person, character, or services, for the sake of which the Father is pleased to pardon and bless those in behalf of whom he mediates. But, not to anticipate the subject of a future Essay, it suffices to observe at present, that if the Father saw it necessary for the display of his glory in the salvation of sinners, that the Mediator should be Emmanuel, his co-equal Son in human nature, God manifest in the flesh; and that it was wholly improper for any other person to sustain this office, or approach him in this character, except "his well beloved Son, in whom he is well pleased;" and if sinners pertinaciously reject his authenticated testimony to this divine Mediator, and will regard him as a mere man; they must exclude themselves from the benefit of this gracious constitution, and exceedingly affront both the Father and the Son. Can it indeed at all be supposed, that such men are taught by that Spirit, whose office it is to glorify Christ, when they thus studiously degrade him? yet, "if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his." It will be shown in due time, that the mediation of Christ is the grand display of the divine glory, of the honour of the law, and of the evil of sin: and, in this view of it, the personal dignity of Christ, like the centre stone of an arch, sustains the whole: take that away, the whole must fall, either at once or by degrees. This reasoning is supported by well known and multiplied examples. They who deny the Deity of Christ next learn to explain away the doctrine of the atonement. That of his intercession and priestly character is soon proportionably disregarded; the evil and desert of sin then seem to vanish from their view; and they have little fear of future punishment, but object to the plain language of Scripture on that subject: this makes way for doubts about the authenticity, or divine inspiration, of the sacred oracles, and often terminates in rejecting them: and when such men are still pressed with difficulties from undeniable facts, they proceed to deny the providence, and then the very being of a God. It is manifest, that this hath been the unhappy progress of many: for when the Deity of Christ is denied, his mediation cannot consistently be maintained; and when that is rejected, the Book, in which it is the principal subject, must soon sink into insignificancy at least, and be treated with neglect.

III. The peculiar nature of the faith, love, and obedience, which the word of God expressly requires us to exercise towards the Lord Jesus, confirms the point in question. The prophet says, (Jer. xvii. 5. 6.) “Cursed be the man that trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arm, and whose heart departeth from the Lord:” and the Psalmist (Ps. cxlvi. 3.) cautions us in these words—“Put not your trust in princes, nor in the son of man, in whom there is no help:” yet nothing can be plainer, than that we are required to put our trust in Christ; and if he were only the Son of man, and had only an arm of flesh, I cannot see how we could trust in him, without “departing from the Lord.”—The form of Baptism, “into the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost,” implies a professed dependence for salvation on the Son, and on the Holy Ghost, and a devoted faithful attachment to them, as well as to the Father.—The expression, “believe in the Son of God,” signifies not only an assent to his truths, but a reliance on him for all the blessings which he is exalted to bestow. The Apostle speaks of Christians, as those “who trusted on Christ:” (Eph. i. 12) faith, or its inseparable effect, is commonly described by “coming to Christ,” “receiving him,” or “abiding in him;” and such expressions must imply application to him, and habitual dependence on him, even now he is invisible to us, and not present in his human nature.

We are commanded to “walk in him,” which must include a constant reliance on his power, truth, and love, as well as a regard to his authority: (Col. ii. 6. 7.) “He suffered being tempted, that he might be able to succour us when tempted ;” (Heb. ii. 17. 18.) does not this teach us to apply to and rely on him in our temptations? He promised his disciples a mouth and wisdom : (Luke xxi. 15.) ought they not, therefore, to rely on him to fulfil that promise? Can he be our life, unless we depend on him for the life of our souls? (Col. iii. 1—4. 13.) Does he forgive sins, and ought not the sinner to rely on him for pardon? Does he send the Holy Spirit, to teach, comfort, and sanctify his people ; and ought we not to depend on him for that blessing? Hath he all power in heaven and earth ; and shall we do wrong to trust that power in all circumstances? Has he engaged to be with his assembled disciples ; and should they not expect and depend on his gracious presence? (Matt. xviii. 20. xxviii. 20, John xiv. 20—24.) In short, the believer can do nothing of himself ; and “ can do all things through Christ who strengthened him ;” “ he has communion with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ :” (1 John i. 3) and how can these things be, unless he habitually relies on him and applies to him in all these respects? They, who do not trust in Christ, can receive no communications from him, nor maintain any intercourse with him ; and it is no wonder that they deride those as enthusiasts, who experience what they despise. But if such a dependence on Christ be essential to faith, the doctrine of his Deity must be essential also : for no man can reasonably rely on a mere creature, to forgive his sins, to sanctify his soul, to raise his body from the grave, and to give him eternal life : and can one deny such a reliance to be idolatrous? To form these expectations from Christ we must believe that He is “ God over all, blessed for evermore ;” “ the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever.” (Rom. ix. 5. Heb. xiii. 8. Rev. i. 4. xi. 17.)

In like manner the love, which Christ demands of us, cannot belong to any mere creature. We are required to love him more than our nearest relatives, or even than our own lives ; nay, to hate all these, when they come in competition with our love to him ; otherwise we are not worthy of him, and cannot be his disciples * : Now, what is this but to love him supremely, and as we should love the Father? Yet we are never cautioned not to let our love of Christ interfere with “that love of God with all our hearts,” which the law requires: it is not once intimated, that there is any incongruity, disparity, or even distinction, between our love of the Father, and of the Son: nay, the more we love Christ, the greater our love of the Father is supposed to be, and the more shall we be loved of him *. The decisions of the great day of account are represented as awarded by this rule: they who have loved Christ, and shown their love to him by kindness to his disciples for his sake, will be considered as true believers and righteous persons; they, who shall be proved not to have loved him by their neglect of his poor disciples, will be considered as unbelievers and impenitent sinners, and condemned to have their portion with the wicked †. But can we suppose, that no mention would on this occasion be made of the love of God, if the love of Christ had been entirely distinct from it; or if it were not certain, that the more we love the Son, the more we love the Father that sent him?

The Apostle Paul likewise solemnly blesses “all, that love the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity;” he denounces an awful curse on every man who does not love the Lord Jesus Christ ‡; and he represents the love of Christ, as the constraining principle of all his own devoted labours and services §. Another Apostle speaks of the love of an unseen Saviour, as the universal experience of all Christians ||; and when that Apostle denied his Lord, he was thrice interrogated whether he loved him, before he was re-instated in his pastoral office ¶. No such special and pre-eminent love towards any one of the mere servants of God is required of us: nay, the Apostle was afraid lest he, or his brethren, should be put in Christ’s place, when he inquired, “was Paul crucified for you? or were “you baptized in the name of Paul *?” But our Lord never intimated, that there was any danger, lest his disciples should love him, in a degree that would be derogatory to the rights of God the Father.—The Lord is a jealous God, and cannot endure a rival in our affections, but demands our whole heart. How then can “Christ dwell in our hearts,” as Lord of our affections, if He and the Father be not One? Seeing therefore we ought to love Christ, even as we love the Father; it must be necessary that we believe him to be the adequate object of that love; both for what he is in himself, and what he hath done for us: and thus the doctrine of his Deity, if true, must be essential; and unless we believe it, how can we keep clear of the Apostle's anathema?

We are constantly reminded in the sacred Scriptures that we are “not our own, but the Lord's:” we are his property, because he made us: and, when by sin we had alienated ourselves, we became His again, as “bought with a price, to glorify him, in body and spirit, which are his †.” Yet the Apostles always speak of believers, as belonging to Christ; they are his servants, his purchased flock, his espoused bride, (though the Lord of hosts is called the husband of the Church ‡.) yea, the members of his body. Paul says, in one place, that ‘He was dead to the law, that he might live unto God ;’ in another, ‘that he lived no longer to himself, but to him who died for him and rose again ;’ and that ‘Christ died and rose again, that he might be the Lord both of the living and of the dead §.’ And he observes, that ‘the Lord Jesus gave himself for us, to redeem us from all iniquity, and purify us unto himself, to be a peculiar people zealous of good works ||.’ Could such language as this be properly used concerning services rendered to a mere man? Surely it would be an idolatrous alienation of ourselves from the service of our Maker, to devote ourselves to that of a fellow-creature. But if Christ be truly God, One with the Father: then our dedication of ourselves to his service is the same as our devoted obedience to the Father that sent him; and is no other than the prescribed manner, in which as redeemed sinners we are required to render it.

In short, it must be evident to all, who reverence the language of Scripture, and diligently investigate the subject; that we honour, obey, and worship the Father, when we honour, obey, and worship the Son: and that all the glory rendered to the Son, redounds to the glory of the Father, 'who is glorified in the Son*.' But indeed who can believe, that it should be the office of the Holy Spirit to 'glorify Christ,' if it be of little or no consequence what men think of his person; or if proper views of it are not essential to Christianity? or that the Apostle would, in that case, have spoken of his 'name being glorified in and by 'his saints,' both now and at the day of judgment †?

Finally, we are every where in Scripture required to glory and rejoice in the Lord; and not to glory or rejoice in ourselves, in worldly advantages, or in men.—Yet Paul characterizes Christians, as 'rejoicing' or glorifying 'in Christ ‡;' He says, 'I protest by your rejoicing, which 'I have in Christ Jesus ||.' He speaks to the Philippians of their rejoicing being more abundant in Christ 'Jesus §:' and he evidently applies the language of the prophets, requiring men to 'glory in Jehovah,' to Jesus Christ; even while he cautioned his people, not to glory in men ¶. In like manner Peter, speaking of the appearing of Jesus Christ, says to his brethren, 'Whom having not seen ye love; in whom ye see him 'not, yet believing, ye rejoice with joy unspeakable and 'full of glory ††.' And could this joy be any other, either in its nature or object, than that mentioned by the Apostle Paul.—‘ We rejoice in the hope of the glory of ‘ God.’—‘ And not only so, but we also joy in God*.’ On the supposition that Jesus is a mere creature, Jehovah would give his glory to another, if he inspired his servants to use such language : so that the confidence, love, gratitude, devotedness of heart, and honour, which the Scriptures require us to render to Christ, must be impracticable, unless we have a proper judgment of his dignity and excellency ; and we must either rob him of the glory due to his name, or give Jehovah’s glory to another, if we mistake in this fundamental matter.

IV. The nature of heavenly felicity confirms this reasoning. The language of the Apostle is emphatical, “ To depart hence, and to be with Christ, which is far “ better :” for this implies that the presence of Christ, the discoveries of his glory, and the enjoyment of his love, constitute the happiness for which he longed † ; and in what does this differ from the beatific vision ?—But in the last chapters of the Revelation of John which describe the heavenly state, this is still more plainly declared. He, whose name is “ Alpha and Omega,” says, “ I* will give him that “ is athirst of the water of life freely. He that overcom- “ eth shall inherit all things ; and I will be his God, and “ he shall be my Son. †” If any person should explain this passage of the Father, it would only prove, that “ the “ Father and Son are one ;” for the Son is doubtless called Alpha and Omega. Again, the Apostle “ saw no temple ” in the new Jerusalem ; “ for the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb are the Temple of it : and the city had “ no need of the Sun, neither of the Moon ; for the glory “ of God did lighten it, and the Lamb was the light there- “ of ||.” He next saw a “ pure river of water of life— “ proceeding out of the throne of God, and of the Lamb : —and there shall be no more “ curse, but the throne of “ God, and of the Lamb shall be in it, and his servants shall “ serve him ; and they shall see his face, and his name

“ shall be in their foreheads *.” Can any thing be plainer, than that the writer of this book believed the Son to be One with and equal to the Father ; the Fountain of light, life, purity, and felicity ; in whose “ presence is fulness of joy, and pleasures at his right hand for evermore ?”—The worship of heaven likewise is represented, as a constant ascription of praise and honour to Christ, together with the Father ; so that we cannot sing on earth the very words of the heavenly choir, with apparent fervour and unreserved approbation, without danger of being deemed enthusiasts ; as it is manifest from the care taken by many persons, to expunge every expression of this kind from their books of psalms and hymns for public worship, as well as from their other services †.—Will there then be discordant companies of worshippers in heaven ? Or, if all must be harmonious, are we never to learn the song of the redeemed, till we come to heaven ? Or how can we learn this song, if we never come to a settled determination in our minds, whether the Lamb that was slain be worthy of all worship and honour, or not ? or if it be indifferent, whether we adore and expect felicity from him, as God ; or only respect his memory, as a good man ?

V. Lastly, the language of authority, which we are assured our future Judge will use at the last day, should not pass unnoticed in this argument. As the happiness of heaven is represented under the idea of “ entering into his joy,” and “ beholding his glory † :” so the misery of the wicked is spoken of, as a banishment from his presence, and the endurance of his wrath. He will not say, “ Depart from God,” but “ Depart from me § :” and in a figurative description of the great consternation of his enemies, in which is an evident reference to the day of judgment, they are introduced as “ calling on the rocks and mountains to hide them from—the wrath of the Lamb ; for the day of his great wrath is come, and who is able to abide it ||.”

‡ Luke xii. 37. Matt. xxv. 21.

If then we believe that 'he shall come to be our judge;' it must be of the greatest importance, that we know who he is, by whom our eternal state is to be decided. For surely it will be very dreadful for those to meet him arrayed in glorious majesty, who, during their whole lives, refused him the honour he demanded, treated his declarations of his personal dignity as false or unmeaning, and continually uttered hard speeches against him *! The season of his coming will be emphatically "the day of God †;" and it behooves every one of us to "prepare to meet our God," that we "may be found of him in peace, without spot and blameless."

But to all these Scriptural demonstrations of the truth and importance of this essential doctrine, some objections are opposed, which are considered as insurmountable;—a few of which shall here be very briefly noticed.—It is objected, that the Deity of Christ is inconsistent with the unity of God; or else that it is irrational, unintelligible, and contradictory. But doubtless, something more than confident assertion is requisite to prove the doctrine of the Trinity to be inconsistent with the divine Unity. The Apostle speaks of the body, soul, and spirit, as constituting the same individual man, (though some perhaps may object to his language :) if then a man may be three in one respect, and one in another, do we not know so much of God, as to assert it is impossible that somewhat similar, but far superior, and more entire both in the distinction and in the unity, should take place in his incomprehensible nature? And ought not men to speak more reverently and cautiously on a subject, about which we know nothing more than what God himself hath taught us; especially as much is spoken in Scripture, which so appears to have this meaning, that the most of Christians in every age have thus understood it? We do not say that the Deity is Three in One in the same sense; nor do we pretend to explain or comprehend how God subsists in three Persons, the * Jude 14, 15. Rev. i. 7. † 2 Pet. iii. 12—14.

Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost; but we would humbly believe his testimony concerning himself, and adore his incomprehensible majesty.

One would scarcely have expected, that this doctrine should have been objected to, because it is mysterious; when the Apostle expressly calls it the GREAT MYSTERY OF GODLINESS. But indeed, till we can comprehend ourselves, it is absurd to object to mysteries in those things which relate to the infinite God! The power of mind over matter is mysterious in the highest degree; yet our will moves our tongues and limbs continually, and we know not how: so that our own existence, as well as that of God, must be denied, if we admit it not. Mysteries are found in the productions of every plant and animal, which philosophy can never explain. The style of God in all his works is mystery; and shall we suppose that his own nature is not, above all, mysterious? Experiment is allowed to be the proper standard of our discoveries of the powers of nature: should not then the testimony of God concerning himself, terminate our inquiries concerning his incomprehensible Essence? For “can we by searching find out God? can we find out the Almighty to perfection?” If men object Christ’s inferiority, as Man and Mediator, to the Father, or his growth in wisdom and stature; we answer, that such testimonies, when compared with those which ascribe omniscience and other divine perfections to Him, demonstrate that he had another nature in union with that true humanity of which such things are spoken. And “his delivering up the kingdom to God, even the Father,” which has sometimes been objected to the doctrine of his Deity, (1 Cor. xv. 24—28.) only establishes the distinction between the absolute and everlasting kingdom of God as Creator; and the mediatorial kingdom of Christ, as the Divine Saviour of sinners. The absolute kingdom existed before sin entered, and will exist for ever, after the mediatorial kingdom hath answered its grand design, and is come to an end; but the Son will be One with the Father to eternity, as he was in the beginning, before time was, or creation had taken place.

If any person should be convinced, by these plain arguments, of the truth and importance of this doctrine, I would conclude with warning him not to rest in the notion of it ; but to apply it practically, by relying on Emmanuel for all things belonging to salvation, and by rendering him that love, and honour, and worship, and obedience, which are due to his name. The truth held in unrighteousness can only increase a man's condemnation ; but they who deem it the life of their souls should endeavour to adorn, and promote the knowledge of it, by all suitable means ; remembering that " the servant of the Lord must not
 " strive, but be gentle to all men ; in meekness instructing
 " those that oppose themselves ; if God peradventure will " give them repentance to the acknowledging of the truth ;
 " and that they may recover themselves out of the snare
 " of the devil, who are taken captive by him at his will," (2 Tim. ii. 24—26.)

ESSAY VIII.

On the Nature and Design of the Mediatorial Office, sustained by the Lord Jesus Christ.

THE Meditation of Christ, between a Holy God and sinful men, has an immediate connexion with every part of that religion which bears his name : and all who call themselves Christians, should use great diligence in seeking an accurate and edequate knowledge of this interesting subject, as far as they can deduce it from the sacred Scriptures. It is therefore intended in this Essay, to make some observations on meditation in general—to explain the nature and ends of our Lord's mediation in particular—to show in what respects He, and none else, was qualified to sustain such an office—and to prove from Scripture, that he is a Mediator according to the import of that term as here explained.

The interposition of a Mediator in the affairs of men, implies that some difference, or ground of difference, subsists between the two parties: it supposes, that, at least, one of them has cause of complaint or resentment against the other; and that consequences, injurious to one, or both of them, or to those connected with them, may be apprehended, if the controversy be not amicably terminated. To prevent these effects, some person, either of his own accord, or at the request, and by the appointment of one or both the contending parties interposes; and endeavours, by his authority, influence, or good offices, to effect a pacification on such terms as are supposed to be equitable, or at least not materially injurious to either party: for if a Mediator should take great care of the rights and interests of one party, and evidently neglect those of the other; he would be justly condemned, as acting inconsistently with the design and nature of his office. He should, therefore, behave as the friend of both parties; accommodating the differences according to the justice of their claims, and in a manner as satisfactory to each of them, as can consist with equity and impartiality.

In some cases a superior in station or power may assume the office of Mediator, and by authority induce the contending parties to accept of the terms proposed to each of them. In others, the end may be accomplished by argument, remonstrance, or persuasion: and this is nothing more than convincing both parties, that they ought to make, or accept of such concessions, for the sake of peace and their mutual good, as are equitable and reasonable; and then inducing them to act according to the dictates of their understanding and conscience. But sometimes, (especially when one party is much inferior to the other, and hath been highly criminal or injurious,) the office of a Mediator chiefly consists, in prevailing with the offended superior to accept of such concessions and satisfaction, as the other can make; and not to proceed against him with rigour, though he deserve it: and if this can be effected, it only remains for him to prevail with the inferior, or criminal party, to make the required concessions. A Mediator, however, on some occasions, out of great love and pity to the offender, may offer to make compensation at his own expense for the injuries done; in order that the other party may, without loss or dishonour, lay aside his purposes of inflicting deserved punishment.

Various qualifications are requisite for persons who sustain the office of a Mediator between two parties at variance, in any of the cases which have been stated: but our attention must principally be fixed upon the last; as it doubtless most accords to the interesting subject, which it is intended to illustrate. Should any one interpose between a sovereign prince and his rebellious subjects, in order to prevail with him to show them mercy; it is obvious, that he should himself be free from all suspicion of in the least favouring their rebellion; otherwise his interposition would render him the more suspected. He ought likewise to be a person of that rank and character, or to have done those important services, which entitle him to the confidence of his sovereign, and tend to render it honourable for him, at his instance, to pardon those that deserve punishment. Every one must perceive the absurdity of a criminal undertaking to mediate in behalf of his associates in guilt: nor could an obscure person, of indifferent character, and in no respect intitled to, or possessed of the affection or confidence of the prince, attempt such an interposition without manifest impropriety. If a company of men, in such circumstances, were desirous of thus conciliating the favour of their offended lord; they would naturally turn their thoughts to one of his chief nobles, to some person that had performed signal services with great renown, or to his principal favourite, (Acts xii. 20.) or even to his beloved Son, if they had any prospect or hope of obtaining his good offices.—And if such a mediator could be engaged in their behalf, with so firm and cordial an attachment to their cause, as to say with Paul, when he mediated with Philemon for Onesimus, "if they have wronged thee, or owe thee aught, put that on mine account—I will repay it," (Philemon xix. 20.) and if he really were competent to make good such an engagement; his interposition would have its utmost advantage for success.

But no mediator can be fully authorized for his office, unless, by one means or other, both parties allow of his interference: at least his mediation cannot have its due effect, till they both accede to his terms, or plan of accommodating their differences. For if one party authorize him to propose certain terms to the other, as the utmost that he will yield; the whole must yet be frustrated and the dissention perpetuated, if these terms be pertinaciously rejected: except when the mediator acts also as an umpire, and compels the parties to accept of his prescribed conditions.—There is also an evident propriety in a mediator's standing in such a relation to each of the parties, as to lay a foundation for his being considered as an equal friend to both of them, in all respects, in which their rank, or the justice of the cause will admit of it: so that there can be no reason to suspect, that a person thus situated, will sacrifice the interests or rights of one party, from a partial regard to the other.

These observations concerning the office of a Mediator, as well known among men, may enable us to understand more clearly the doctrine of Scripture respecting the mediatorial office of Emmanuel: and we may very properly argue from them, in something of the same manner that Paul did from the office of High-Priest among the Jews, when he wrote to them concerning the High-Priesthood of Christ. This indeed was a divinely appointed type and shadow of the subject, that the Apostle illustrated and confirmed by it: whereas, our arguments, from the office of a Mediator among men, derive their force from analogy, or the particulars in which the cases coincide. Yet as the Lord himself has represented the office of Christ under the idea of a Mediator; it is manifest that he intended to assist, and not to mislead or confuse our apprehensions by the allusion; and this allows us to make what use we can, with caution and sobriety, of the case alluded to, in order to explain more clearly the subject which it illustrates.

We must, therefore, in the next place, reflect on the need there was for "a Mediator between God and man." Had the human species never forfeited the favour, or incurred the displeasure of their bountiful Creator, a Mediator could never have been wanted; for he was of himself sufficiently disposed to favour and bless the work of his own hands. Had not man been brought into a state of alienation from God, and exposed to his just indignation; no reconciliation, and consequently no peace-maker, could have been required. The Angels in heaven approach their God and Father, without the intervention of a Mediator: and so doubtless did man, before sin had made a breach between God and him.—When the first Adam had broken the commandment, and forfeited the covenant of his Creator; and so sin and death had entered into the world, to pass upon the whole race that was about to descend from him: then was "the second Adam, the Lord from heaven," promised, to be the Mediator of a new covenant; under the title of "the Seed of the woman," who "should bruise the Serpent's head." Thus the entrance of sin gave rise to the whole plan of a Mediator: and the malignity or desert of sin alone required such an exalted Mediator, and such a meritorious mediation, as the Scripture reveals and proposes to us. For if a righteous and holy God had not viewed sin, as so evil in its nature and effects, that it would be utterly inconsistent with his glory to show mercy to transgressors, unless some constitution of this kind were previously formed; that love, which provided the Mediator, would have sufficed, (so to speak,) to induce him to pardon them without one. We must not, therefore, imagine that the mediation of Christ is needful, in order to prevail with God to pity, love, and save sinners: on the contrary, we should consider it as the grand effect of his compassion and good will; and as intended to render the exercise of his plenteous mercy consistent with the honour of his justice, and conducive to the harmonious display of all his perfections.

Men had forfeited their Creator's favour, and deserved his anger, by transgression; they had also lost his holy image, and become vile and miserable, even "vessels of wrath fitted for destruction:" but it pleased their offended Sovereign, "to the praise of his glory," and the discovery of his infinite and everlasting mercy and bounty, (for God is LOVE,) to purpose the reconciliation, recovery, and eternal felicity of an innumerable multitude of the fallen race. It did not, however, become Him, as the infinitely righteous and holy Governor of the universe, to show such favour to the guilty and unholy, without adopting some decisive method of declaring his judgment concerning their crimes and deserts. Otherwise it might have been supposed, that he did not wholly abhor sin; that he meant to desist from the demands of his violated law; that it needed not to have been made so strict; that it was not requisite for his rational creatures on all occasions to obey it, or that transgressors should be punished according to its sanction; and that it was owing to some other cause, than his perfect justice and holy abhorrence of evil, that he so severely executed vengeance on some of his rebellious subjects. To obviate such conclusions, it became the God of glory to devise some plan, according to which the largest exercise of his pardoning mercy, and saving grace, might consist with the most affecting display of his avenging justice and hatred of iniquity. For this purpose, as it is manifest from the Scriptures, his infinite wisdom and love had formed, and then revealed, the plan of a Mediator, through whom a new covenant was arranged and proposed to sinners; according to which all things pertaining to eternal life are freely bestowed, for his sake, on all who apply for them in the appointed way. "Thus the riches of God's mercy have abounded towards us in all wisdom and frudence." (Eph. i. 7, 8.) Through the intervention of a Mediator, sinners are saved; and yet the Lord does not so much as seem to favour sin: nay, he in the most decisive manner shows his judgment of what punishment it deserves, his holy abhorrence of it, and his determination in all possible cases, "to magnify the law and make it honourable."

If, in discoursing on such subjects, we are constrained to accommodate our language and reasonings to the conceptions and usages of men; we do no more than imitate the sacred writers, and can aptly express our meaning in the words which they have used before us: whereas, they, who object to such explanations, are obliged to represent the style of Scripture, as highly, (if not absurdly,) figurative; and frequently to caution their disciples against too literal an explanation of it: nay, it costs them much labour, as well as great ingenuity, to furnish such interpretations as accord with their rational systems, and which common readers could never have thought of. And what is this, but an insinuation, that the sacred writers have used a language, extremely suited to mislead and confuse the unlearned and simple part of mankind? But, indeed, the Apostle has shown at large, that the Mediation of Christ was intended especially for this end, "that God might be just, and the justifier of the believer;" "a just God, and a Saviour." (Rom. iii. 2. Is. xlv. 21.)

If we examine the subject more minutely, we shall find, that the Mediation of Christ is of that kind, which required such a person to sustain and perform it, as the Scriptures testify him to be. If any one should interpose between an offended sovereign and his rebellious subjects, in order that for his sake exemption from punishment, and the grant of valuable privileges, should be conferred on them; he must stand high in the estimation of the prince, and be a person of known worth and dignity among all who are acquainted with the transaction: otherwise there would be no ground to expect that his requests would be attended to: nor any care taken, if they were, to manifest the demerit of the pardoned offenders, or the clemency and bounty of their reconciled sovereign. But what man, or mere creature, could thus interpose between the infinite God and the apostate children of men? Who could have thought of requesting, that for his sake, and at his instance, all the crimes of those who came in his name, should be pardoned, all their wants supplied, and all spiritual and eternal blessings conferred upon them? Would not such an intrusion have been considered as an act of rebellion, or at least a preference given to the happiness of rebels above the glory of God? Who among the Angels of heaven, or any of the creatures that God has made, could pretend to personal dignity, excellency, merit, or services sufficient to authorize such a requisition? Or how could it have been imagined, that, if the Lord did not see good to spare and bless sinners for his own name's sake; he would be induced to do it for the sake of a derived dependent being, who lived, moved, and existed in and by him alone? If it had been consistent with the display of his glory, to have saved sinners without an atonement, he would not have wanted any external inducement to do it; but if his honour and the salvation of sinners in this way were incompatible, who could possibly prevail with him to dishonour himself? Or could any mere created being have undertaken to render the exercise of mercy and grace to sinners, consistent with his perfect justice and the honour of his law? Alas! their best services must all be due for themselves, and on account of benefits already conferred: even their own felicity, strictly speaking, must be gratuitous, not merited: nor hath one of them power to endure the punishment of a single transgression, without finally sinking under it; for 'the wages of sin is death.' So that it cannot be conceived, that the office of Mediator between God and man, which Christ performs, could possibly have been sustained by any mere creature; or that any one had sufficient love to have induced him to undertake it for the benefit of the unholy and rebellious.—But when the eternal Son of the Father; when He, who created and upholds all worlds, for whom all things were made, and whom all Angels worship, voluntarily engaged himself to mediate a peace between the offended Sovereign of the universe and his sinful creatures: 'to the principalities and powers in heavenly places was known—the manifold wisdom of God;' and all the holy intelligences that ever have been, or shall be, made acquainted with this grand design, must perceive, that his personal dignity and excellence; his ineffable union with, and relation to, the Father; as well as his boundless power, love, and holiness, rendered him in all respects the proper Person to accomplish it, and bring it to a happy and glorious event; and that He only was competent for such an undertaking.

If a Mediator was to be constituted for such ends as have been stated, it must be proper that the Lord should choose and appoint him to this important office. 'No one taketh this honour to himself, but he that is called of God.' A self-appointed Mediator must have been deemed an intruder. The criminals could not reasonably expect to have the nomination of him: they had no just ground of complaint; the whole design must be formed for their relief and advantage: the rights and glory of God must be first considered and secured in the execution of it; and he alone could know whom it became him to intrust with so vast a concern, as involved in it, not only the interests of his universal kingdom, but the eternal honour of his own great name.—We know to whom he hath committed this office; and we are sure, from the event, that he saw none else, in heaven or earth, whom he could so properly have appointed to it: for he does nothing in vain, and would not have sent his only begotten Son on a design, which one of his servants could have executed with the same success and advantage. But we may understand enough in this matter to perceive, that it would have been highly improper, for the infinite God to have appointed a mere creature to this office, and to have intrusted his own glory, the salvation of innumerable souls, and the interests of his everlasting kingdom, into his hands. In such a cause, 'he puts no trust in his servants, and charges even his Angels with folly.' (Job iv. 18.)

At the same time, however, this Mediator is, in all respects, suited to our case, and worthy of our confidence. If it had been revealed, that God would deal with us through a Mediator, and we had been required to look out for one, on whom we could most entirely and unreservedly depend, when eternal happiness or misery was at a stake; what could we have done? We could never have intrusted such an important cause in the hands of any mere man: nay, the more we had considered the matter, in all its difficulties and consequences, the greater hesitation should we have felt to confide it to the hands of a mere creature: for all are changeable; and we should have been apprehensive, lest some want of power, love, truth, wisdom, or constancy should induce a failure, when our eternal All was at a stake. Yet we could never have thought of such a Mediator, as our offended God hath himself provided, appointed, and revealed, who is ‘the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever,’ and who is ‘the true and holy One,’ ‘Emmanuel,’ ‘God over all blessed for evermore.’—Here we can have no ground for fear; unbelief alone can hesitate. He, whose power sustains the universe, is able to save our souls in all possible cases. He, who is worthy to be intrusted with the rights of God and the eternal glory of his Name, must also be worthy to be intrusted with our immortal interests; (for our rights, in this respect, are all forfeited :) and He, who, in perfect justice and purity himself, could so pity and condescend to guilty polluted creatures, as to undertake such an office wholly for their benefit, cannot want love to accomplish whatever is wanting for the eternal salvation of all who accept of his mediation.

But the appointed method, in which this great Mediator performs his most gracious design, hath laid a still more firm foundation for our unshaken confidence. It was proper, that the terms of our reconciliation should be proposed by the Lord himself: and, as these had respect to the Mediator, they required him to assume our nature into personal union with his Deity; that as ‘God manifest in ‘ the flesh,’ he might stand related to us also, in the most intimate manner, as our Brother, bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh: that so, he might properly represent us, undertake our cause as interested in it by the ties of one common nature, and encourage our most unlimited confidence in his compassion and love—Thus hath he humbled, emptied, and impoverished himself. As they, in behalf of whom he mediated, ‘ were partakers of flesh and blood, he also took part of the same:’ ‘ he is not ashamed to call them brethren:’ and, as his union with the Father, in the divine nature, renders him a proper Person to vindicate his rights and display his glory; so, in virtue of his union with us in the human nature, we may most cheerfully rely on him to take care of our immortal souls.—This also shows the propriety of his interposing in our behalf: for some connexion or relation is supposed to subsist between the Mediator and those for whom he acts; else, why does he solicit favour for them, rather than for others in similar circumstances? And, even if the plea be supported by some payment or satisfaction made, it seems proper, that there should be a ground, on which to determine for whom this is done, and to whom the benefit of it shall belong.

When, therefore, the Son of God undertook the office of Mediator between God and man, ‘ he took not on him the nature of Angels,’ as he meant not to mediate in their behalf; but he assumed the human nature. And this renders it very obvious and natural for us to conclude, that all he did and suffered on earth, and all he now performs in heaven, in the character of Mediator, was exclusively intended for the benefit of men, whose nature he bears, for whom he mediates, and to whose account the whole will be imputed; that is, to such of them as avail themselves of his mediation. For if men, who have this divine constitution stated to them with suitable evidence, do not approve of the Mediator, but reject his mediation, they of course exclude themselves from the benefit of it. We shall therefore, in the two following Essays, consider more particularly the righteousness and atonement of our great Mediator, and his continual intercession in heaven for us. It is, indeed, almost impossible to discourse in general concerning his mediation, without in some degree adverting to these subjects; but it would be improper any further to anticipate them in this place.

It does not seem necessary to attempt a laboured proof, that our Lord's mediation is of that nature, and instituted for those purposes, which have been stated. The general language of Scripture conveys this idea of it, to those who understand and believe it in its obvious literal import. In particular the scope of St. Paul's reasoning, in the epistle to the Hebrews, establishes the doctrine under consideration. Was Moses a typical mediator, at the giving of the law, that through his intervention the national covenant might be ratified between God and the people? This only shadowed forth a better covenant, founded on better promises which Christ had mediated between the Lord and his spiritual Israel: and "this Person was counted "worthy of more honour than Moses," being a "Son "over his own house," which he had builded; whereas "Moses was no more than a servant," or even a part of the house itself. (Heb. iii. 1—6.) Were the high priests, of the order of Aaron, typical mediators between God and the people, in virtue of their perpetual sacrifices, and the burning of incense? The insufficiency and unprofitableness of such mediators, and of all their sacrifices and services, must be shown, to make it manifest that another Priest must arise, after another order; whose dignity, excellency, and invaluable ministrations, might really effect those ends, which the other merely prefigured and represented, as in a picture, or rather as an indistinct and feeble shadow. For through Him access was given to believers to the Mercy-seat of God, in the holy places not made with hands: whereas before, the very shadow of this blessing was concealed by the Veil, and none might approach to it on pain of death, but the high-priest alone; nor he more than one day in a year, with the blood of the sacrifices, and the burning of incense. What do all these arguments (which fill up more than half this epistle,) signify; but that Jesus is such a Mediator, as hath been described? "There is then one Mediator between God and man; even the Man Christ Jesus." (Tim. iii.) No doubt he is truly Man, and performs his mediation in human nature: for he assumed our flesh for this very purpose: but the Apostle, by declaring him to be the one Mediator, excludes all other mediators.—Moses and the priests of Aaron's line were, in a common sense, mediators between God and man; and every believer, when he prays for others, in some degree interposes his requests between God and them, to seek mercy in their behalf. Yet Christ is the only Mediator; because he alone is capable of and appointed to perform such a mediation, as hath been described; in virtue of his personal dignity and the ransom he hath made. "Through him we have access to the Father." "He is our Peace-maker:" "our Advocate with the Father." He says, "I am the Way, and the Truth, and the Life, no man cometh to the Father but by me:" (John xiv. 6.) so that no man ever did, or ever will, find acceptance with God, who rejects Christ's mediation. We must come to God in his Name, asking all blessings for his sake, and presenting all our services by his hands, and through his intercession, even "giving thanks to God and the Father through him."

In this view of the subject, we may consider Christ as the Mediator between God and man, in such a sense, that no sinner on earth can be found to whom we may not propose all the benefits of his mediation; provided he truly come to God by faith in Christ; whereas fallen Angels, and those men who have died in their sins, are wholly excluded from this benefit by the very constitution of the covenant which he mediated. But all other mediators and all attempts to approach God without a mediator, are an affront both to the Father and the Son; even as the sacrifices which the Israelites offered contrary to the law, were an abomination to the Lord. As, therefore, we must shortly meet our offended Sovereign at his awful tribunal; let us now avail ourselves of this inestimable appointment; and constantly approach his throne of grace, through our "faithful and merciful High-priest" and mediator; "that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help " in every time of need."

ESSAY IX.

On the Merits and Atonement of Christ.

THE opinion, that the Deity might be appeased by expiatory sacrifices, has been very widely diffused among the human race; and the attempt has generally been made, by shedding the blood, and burning a part of the body, of some useful animal. This notion and practice seem very remote from the dictates of our natural reason; and it is extremely improbable, that they should have been the result of man's invention. We may therefore most rationally conclude, that it is wholly the doctrine of revelation, and the appointment of God, handed down by tradition, from the progenitors of our race to the several branches of their posterity: and it is certain that we meet with it in the Bible immediately after the entrance of sin. When Cain's oblation of the first-fruits of the earth was rejected, and Abel's sacrifice of the firstlings of the flock accepted; we may naturally conclude, that the latter was presented according to the divine appointment, and that the former was not. But if we inquire into the reason of this appointment, the practice of the patriarchs, and the multiplied precepts in the Mosaic law, as to this particular, we shall not easily arrive at any satisfactory solution; except we admit the doctrine of Christ's atonement, and suppose the whole to refer to him, as the substance of all these shadows. I shall, therefore, in this Essay, endeavour to explain, illustrate, and prove that doctrine, and to show its importance in the Christian religion.

The rules and general usages, respecting expiatory sacrifices under the Old Testament, may assist us in understanding the nature of our Lord's atonement, of which they were types and prefigurations, (Heb. x. 1.) The offender, whose crimes might be thus expiated, was required, according to the nature of the case, to bring "his offering of the flock or of the herd, to the door of the tabernacle." The very nature of the animals appointed for sacrifice was significant: not the ferocious, the noxious, the subtle, or the unclean; but such as were gentle, docile, and valuable; and none of these might be offered, but such as were "without blemish," or perfect in their kind. The offender was directed to bring an offering, in which he had a property to be presented unto God, and thus substituted in his stead for this particular purpose. He must then "lay his hands upon the head" of the sacrifice; which denoted the typical translation of guilt from him, by imputation to the substituted animal. This is generally thought to have been attended by a confession of his sins, and prayers for pardon through the acceptance of his oblation: and doubtless it implied as much, and would be attended at least with secret devotions to that effect by every pious Israelite, (Lev. i. 4. iii. 2. iv. 4. xvi. 21.) The blood of the sacrifice was then shed, which, being the life of every animal, was reserved to make atonement, and was therefore not allowed to be eaten under the Old Testament dispensation, (Gen. ix. 4. Lev. xvii. 11.) Afterwards the body, or a part of it, was burned upon the altar with the fire which came immediately from heaven, both at the opening of the tabernacle-worship, and afterwards at the consecration of Solomon's temple, (Lev. ix. 24. 2 Chron. vii. 1—3.) Now, who can help perceiving that this fire represented the avenging justice of God, (who is a consuming fire;) and that, when it consumed the harmless unblemished sacrifice, whilst the guilty offerer escaped, it aptly prefigured the way of a sinner's salvation, through the expiatory sufferings of the spotless Lamb of God? The animal's violent death, by the shedding of its blood, denoted the offender's desert of temporal death; and the subsequent burning of its fat, or flesh, showed him to be exposed to future vengeance: but then, they represented the guilt and punishment, in both respects, as translated from him to the sacrifice which bore them in his stead.—The whole ceremony concluded with the sprinkling of the blood, and in many cases its application to all those things that pertained to the worship of God; which evidently typified the believer's deliverance from guilt and punishment, from the sting and dread of death, and finally from death itself, from sin and all its consequences; the acceptance of his person and services, and his participation of eternal life and felicity, through "Him who loved him, and "washed him from his sins in his own blood."

These appointments were varied, in divers particulars, as they respected the several kinds of sacrifices: but most of them coincided in the grand outlines here mentioned. The paschal Lamb, the flesh of which was roasted and eaten; and the bodies of the sin-offerings for the congregation, which were burned without the camp, form the principal exceptions: but these variations serve to illustrate the several parts of that great subject, which was exhibited by them. Even the thank-offerings and peace-offerings, though evidently typical of the believer's spiritual worship, and communion with God and with the saints, were all attended with the shedding and sprinkling of the blood, and the burning of the fat, of the sacrifices on which they feasted. Nay, the very purifications with water, (the emblem of sanctification,) the re-admission of a leper into the congregation, the consecration of a priest, and the performance of a Nazarite's vow, were in different ways connected with the same observances. "Almost all things "were purged with blood, and without shedding of blood, "there was no remission," (Heb. ix. 22.) so that this ran through the whole ritual law, and was interwoven with every part of the worship performed by the ancient church of God.

We need not to be surprised, that they who overlook the typical import of the ritual law, or doubt of the atonement of Christ, should either consider these institutions as ‘an overgrown mass of trivial ceremonies;’ or attempt to account for them from the policy of Moses; or trace them from the customs of the surrounding nations. But indeed the Israelites were expressly forbidden to imitate the Gentiles; several institutions in the law were intended to keep them at a distance from their superstitions: if any agreement be found in other respects, it is far more reasonable to suppose, that the Gentiles borrowed their usages from the Israelites, than that the Israelites were encouraged or required to copy the worship of idolaters; and the Epistle to the Hebrews sufficiently proves to all who read it as the word of God, that these ceremonies were shadows or types of the redemption by Jesus Christ as made by him, and as received by the believer.—Indeed, some persons of great eminence in their line, would persuade us, that the penmen of the New Testament accommodated their language on this subject to the usages of the Jews; and rather wrote agreeably to vulgar notions and prejudices, than according to the true nature of the subject. This must mean, (if it mean any thing more, than at any rate to evade an argument which cannot be answered,) that the Apostles were mistaken, or that they wilfully misled mankind. We may therefore safely infer, from this method of reasoning on such a subject, that the divine inspiration of the New Testament in general, of the Epistles in particular, and especially of that to the Hebrews, must be given up by all who persist in denying the real atonement of Christ; whenever this argument is used against them with energy, by some able and zealous controversialist; or at least, that they must be forced to betake themselves to evasion, and other ingenious ways of losing sight of the precise point contested with them.

As every one of the grand divisions of Holy Scripture carries along with it the evidence of its own divine original; so it may not be unseasonable to observe, that this is particularly the case with the books of Moses, which some have lately affected to speak of, as a respectable ancient composition; yet with very plain intimations, that they are not to be regarded as of divine inspiration. But are not the prophecies contained in these books, fulfilling even at this day, in the state of the Jewish nation, and of the posterity of Ham? Did not our Lord quote them as the unerring word of God, and not merely as the words of Moses *? And can any man truly believe in Christ, who speaks of those books as a human composition, which he quoted, and by quoting authenticated, as the oracles of God?—But it is most to our present purpose to observe, that the astonishing coincidence between the types of the law, and the language used concerning Christ by his Apostles, establishes the authority of the books of Moses, inseparably from that of the New Testament, as well as teaches us the real meaning of them. If attempts to lessen our regard to this part of Scripture be not the covert attacks of infidelity, most certainly they are well calculated to subserve its cause.

“Known unto God are all his works, from the beginning of the world,” (Acts xv. 18.) What man of common sense therefore, if not warped by prejudice, can suppose that the Lord, having appointed a number of ceremonies, without any reference to a future dispensation, and not suited to give mankind any just views of it, but the contrary, should afterwards so arrange that dispensation, or at least leave his servants so to speak of it, as to lead men to form notions more conformed to those antiquated rites, than to its real nature? Who can conceive, that this new revelation should be made in such language, as must give believers erroneous views of it; unless they are extremely careful how they understand it, make large allowances for the prejudices of education in those who first propagated it, and employ much ingenious labour to discover the truth, by divesting it of the numerous metaphors under which it lies concealed or obscured? Surely, if we allow the Scriptures to be the word of the unerring, unchangeable, and all-wise God, we can scarcely speak of such a method of interpretation, without failing of that reverence which we owe to his divine Majesty! Does an Architect, when about to erect a magnificent edifice, purposely arrange his plan to suit some inconvenient scaffolding, which happens to be upon the spot, having been raised on another occasion? If he build according to a scaffolding, previously made by his directions, is he ever supposed to form the plan of his structure for the sake of the scaffolding? Or does any one doubt, that the scaffolding was raised to suit the plan he had already drawn for his intended building? And is it not almost infinitely more rational to suppose, that the Mosaic law was arranged, with a reference to the future revelation of the gospel; than that the gospel was obscured, and even mis-stated, that it might be made apparently to accord to the abrogated ceremonies of the law?

Though “without shedding of blood, there was no remission” of sins, under the old dispensation; yet it was not possible, that the blood of bulls, and of “goats, should take away sins,” (Heb. ix. 22. x. 4.) If the question should be proposed to a Socinian, why “this was not possible?” he might perhaps find it not very easy to give a direct and satisfactory answer. But if we allow, (according to the idea of “no remission without shedding of blood,”) that the necessity of an atonement, in order to forgiveness, originates from the infinite holiness and justice of God, and the intrinsic evil and desert of sin; and the consequent impossibility that He could pass by sin, without showing his abhorrence of it, and determination to punish it according to its demerit; we shall readily perceive, that nothing could render it consistent with the divine glory to pardon and save sinners, which did not exhibit his justice and holiness in as clear a light in showing them mercy, as these attributes would have appeared in, had he executed the threatened vengeance. And if this were the case, however it might suit the design of infinite wisdom, to appoint the sacrifices of lambs, bulls, and goats, as types and shadows, means of grace, or conditions of temporal remission ; yet they could not possibly take away the guilt of sin, because they were not adequate exhibitions of the infinite justice and holiness of God—For, what proportion could the death of an animal bear to the remission of that guilt, which merited the eternal punishment of an immortal soul ? Or how could rational creatures behold, in such an observance, God's holy hatred of sin and love of sinners ? The same reasoning is conclusive, in respect of the vicarious sufferings of any mere man, or creature.

Suppose it were right that one creature should bear the punishment merited by another ; and that one could be found, free from guilt, and willing to be substituted in the place of his guilty fellow-creature ; yet he could answer, one for one, body for body, life for life, soul for soul : his temporal sufferings could only answer to the temporal release of the condemned criminal ; but could not be an adequate ransom for his immortal soul from future punishment ; much less could it expiate the guilt of the unnumbered crimes of many millions. Should it be said, that this might be, if God had so appointed : I answer, that God appointed the sacrifices of bulls and goats ; yet it was “ impossible, that they should take away sin : ” and for the reason before assigned, it was impossible that God should appoint them as more than a type of the real atonement.—But no mere man can be found, who has not himself deserved the wrath of God : no man's body and soul are his own : no mere creature could be willing to bear the vengeance of heaven for another, if he might ; and none might if he would. It may be our duty to lay down our lives for our brethren ; but it cannot be allowable for us to choose to be eternally unholy and miserable. The eternal Son of the Father, therefore, seeing that no other sacrifice could suffice, said, “ Lo, I come to do thy will, O God.”
(Heb. x. 4—10.)

I do not say that the Lord could not have devised some other way of redemption; but we can conceive no other, by which perfect justice and purity could harmonize with boundless mercy; and as infinite wisdom gave this the preference, we are sure that it was in itself most eligible. The dignity of the divine Redeemer, as One with the Father in the unity of the Godhead; his eternal relation to the Father, as the adequate object of his infinite love; his appointment to, and voluntary susception of his office; his incarnation, and consequent relation to us in the human nature; the perfect purity of his manhood; the complete obedience of his whole life, amidst all kinds of difficulties and temptations; the tortures and ignominy of his death; the entire resignation and meekness with which he suffered; the principle from which his obedience and submission sprang; and the end to which the whole was directed; when duly considered and estimated, will combine to show, that he more honoured the law of God and its awful sanction, by his righteousness and atonement, than if all men had either perfectly obeyed or finally perished. When the Father was pleased thus to wound and bruise his well beloved Son, for the transgressions of his people; his judgment concerning the evil and desert of sin appeared most illustrious! His love to sinners was shown to be inconceivably great; yet he would rather lay the load of their guilt and punishment on Him "in whom his soul delighted," than pardon them without testifying his abhorrence of their crimes! No encouragement could thus be given to others to venture on sin: no other sacrifice of this value and efficacy could be found: all must see, that punishment was not the arbitrary act of an inexorable judge; but the unavoidable result of perfect holiness and justice, even in a Being of infinite mercy. Thus every mouth will at length be stopped, or filled with adoration; every heart impressed with awe and astonishment; every hope taken away from the impenitent and presumptuous; and the glory of God more fully manifested in all his harmonious perfections, than by all his other works, judgments, and dispensations. The story of Zaleucus, prince of the Lochrians, is well known: to show his abhorrence of adultery, and his determination to execute the law he had enacted, condemning the adulterer to the loss of both his eyes; and at the same time to evince his love to his son who had committed that crime; he willingly submitted to lose one of his own eyes, and ordered at the same time one of his son's to be put out! Now what adulterer could hope to escape, when power was vested in a man, whom neither self-love, nor natural affection in its greatest force, could induce to dispense with the law, or relax the rigour of its sentence? Thus the language both of the Father and of the Son, in this way of saving sinners, is manifestly, 'Let the law be magnified and made honourable, in the sight of the whole universe.'

I would not embarrass these brief Essays by any thing superfluous or dubious: yet it seems to fall in with the design of them, to observe, that the reward of righteousness is not annexed to a mere exemption from sin; (for Adam on the day of his creation was free from sin;) but to actual obedience during the appointed time of probation. So that the perfect righteousness of Christ was as necessary, as the atonement of his death, to his mediatorial work on earth: not only, as freedom from personal guilt was requisite, in order to his bearing and expiating the sins of his people; but also as the meritorious purchase of their forfeited inheritance, that the second Adam's benefit might answer to the loss sustained through the first Adam. His was however a suffering obedience, and so expiatory; his death was the highest perfection of obedience, and so meritorious. We need not, therefore, very exactly distinguish between them: yet it is proper to maintain, that the believer is pardoned, because his sin was imputed to Christ, and expiated by his sacrifice; and that he is justified and made an heir of heaven, because Christ "brought in an everlasting righteousness," "which is unto, and upon all them that believe: for there is no difference." Our Lord did not indeed bear all the misery to which the sinner is exposed: not being personally guilty, he could not endure the torments of an accusing conscience; knowing that he should triumph and reign in glory, he could not feel the horrors of despair; and his infinite dignity rendering him able at once to make an all-sufficient atonement, it was not requisite that his sufferings should be eternal, as ours must otherwise have been. But he endured the scorn, rage, and cruelty of men, and all which they could inflict; the utmost malice of the powers of darkness; and the wrath and righteous vengeance of the Father: he bore shame, pain, and death, in all its bitterness; and what he suffered in his soul, during his agonies in the garden, and when he exclaimed on the cross, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" we cannot conceive. We only know, that "it pleased the Lord to bruise him:" the sword of vengeance awoke against him, and the "Father spared him not." We may therefore conclude, that he endured as much of that very misery, which the wicked will endure from the wrath of God, and the malice of the infernal powers, as could consist with perfect innocence, supreme love, and the sure hope of speedy and final deliverance.

Many objections have been made to the doctrine of a real atonement, and a vicarious sacrifice for sin; as if it were irrational, or unjust, or give an unamiable view of the divine character; or as if it were unfavourable to the cause of morality and virtue: and great pains have been taken to explain away the language of holy Scripture on this subject, as if it did not imply any of those things, which the unlearned reader is apt to infer from it. It cannot be expected, that I should give a particular answer to each of these objections, which result rather from the state of men's hearts, than from any solid grounds of reasoning: it may suffice to observe in general, that "God hath made foolish the wisdom of this world;" that "the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness to him;" and especially the "preaching of the cross is foolishness to them that perish." Adverting to such testimonies of the Holy Spirit, we shall know what to think concerning those exclamations of irrational and absurd, which many of those, who are wise in this world, and in their own eyes, employ in opposing the doctrine of the atonement.—Neither can there be any injustice in this statement of it: for if One, who was both able and willing to do it, was pleased to ransom his brethren from deserved eternal ruin, by enduring temporal sufferings and death as their Surety, what injustice could there be in accepting such a vicarious satisfaction for sin? And how can that doctrine give an unamiable view of the Deity, which shows him to be infinite in righteousness, holiness, love, mercy, faithfulness, and wisdom; and displays all these, and every other conceivable moral excellency, in full perfection and entire harmony? it can only appear so to sinners; because justice and holiness are not amiable in the eyes of the unjust and unholy. Or how can that doctrine be prejudicial to the cause of morality, which furnishes the most powerful motives and encouragements to holiness; and shows sin in all its horrid deformity, and with all its tremendous effects; and which has uniformly done more to “teach men to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world,” than all other expedients besides have ever appeared to do?

Let us then proceed to state a few select arguments, which demonstrate that the doctrine, as it hath been explained and illustrated, is contained in the holy Scriptures.

I. The language used in them is decisive. It is not only said, that Jesus “redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us;” (Gal. iii. 15.) that “he suffered once for sins, the just for” (or instead of) “the unjust;” (1 Pet. iii. 18. Isa. liii.) but that “he bare our sins in his own body on the tree;” and “was made sin for us.” (2 Cor. v. 21. 1 Pet. ii. 24.) The prophet speaking above 700 years before, “of the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow,” having observed, that “he bore our griefs and carried our sorrows,” “was “wounded for our transgressions and bruised for our iniquities,” shows the reason of this, by adding that “the Lord laid,” or caused to meet, “on him the iniquity of us all:” so that “it was exacted and he became answerable * :” according to the genuine meaning of the next words, rendered in our version, “He was oppressed, and he was afflicted,”—Thus he would “justify many, for he would bear their iniquities,” and not merely the punishment due to them.—We may, in many cases, say that the innocent suffers for the guilty, when one is exposed to loss or pain by means of another’s fault, or for his benefit: but can it be said, with propriety, that the Lord lays upon the innocent sufferer the iniquity of the offender, or that the latter bears the sins of the former; when no translation or imputation of guilt is intended, and no real atonement made? If so, what words can convey the ideas of imputation and atonement? What determinate meaning can there be in language? Or what doctrine can be deduced with certainty from the sacred oracles? The expressions, ransomed, redemption, purchased, bought with a price, propitiation, and several others, concur to prove this doctrine.

II. The testimony of John Baptist, “Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world,” (John i. 29.) contains a very conclusive argument on this subject. Whatever other reasons may be thought of, for a lamb being the selected emblem of the Lord Jesus; he could not as a Lamb take away sin,” except “by the sacrifice of himself:” his teaching, rule, and example, tend in different ways to reform mankind; and the influences of his Spirit sanctify the believer’s heart. In these respects he may be said in some sense to take away sin: but as a Lamb, he could only take away the guilt of it by giving himself to be slain, that he might “redeem us to God with his blood:” being the Antitype of the paschal lambs and daily sacrifices, even “the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world.”

* Bishop Lowth’s Translation of Isaiah.

III When the Apostle argues, that ‘if Christ were not risen, the Corinthians were yet in their sins;’ (1 Cor. xv. 17) what could he mean, but that, as nothing could prove the reality and efficacy of Christ’s atonement, except his resurrection; so nothing could take away their guilt but that atonement? For their reformation and conversion to the worship and service of the true God was a fact, which could not be denied, whatever men thought of the doctrines in question.

IV. The same Apostle says, that ‘Christ will appear the second time without sin unto salvation.’ (Heb. ix. 28.) ‘But did he not appear the first time without sin?—what then is the meaning of this opposition, that at his first coming he bare our sins, but at his second he shall appear without sin? The words can have no other imaginable sense, but that at his first coming he sustained the person of a sinner, and suffered instead of us; but at his second coming he shall appear, not as a Sacrifice, but as a Judge*.’

V. The apostolical method of exhorting men to holiness evinces the same point. They uniformly draw their arguments, motives, and encouragements from the cross of Christ;—‘His own self bare our sins in his own body on the tree, that we, being dead to sin, might live in righteousness.’ ‘Ye are bought with a price; therefore, glorify God with your bodies and spirits, which are his!’ This is indeed the distinguishing peculiarity of their exhortations, in which they differ from all others, who have attempted to excite men to virtue or morality †.

VI. The appointment of the Lord’s supper, in remembrance of the body of Christ broken, and his blood poured out, and as a representation of the manner in which we become interested in the blessings of his salvation, even by ‘eating his flesh and drinking his blood,’ (John vi. 48—58.) is a most conclusive argument on this subject. The peculiar nature and intent of this ordinance will be considered in a subsequent Essay : but the special event commemorated, and the words of our Lord when he appointed it, ‘ This is my blood of the New Testament, which is shed for you and for many, for the remission of sins ;’ do manifestly prove that his death was a real atonement ; that this atonement is the grand peculiarity of the gospel ; and that no man is a genuine Christian, unless by true faith he become a partaker of that inestimable benefit.

VII. Lastly, The songs of the redeemed in heaven, even of those who had ‘ come out of great tribulation,’ and had shed their blood as martyrs in the cause of Christ, may well close these brief but unanswerable arguments in proof of this important doctrine.—Without one discordant voice, they ascribe their salvation to ‘ the Lamb that was slain, and had redeemed them to God with his blood :’ ‘ Who had washed them from their sins in his own blood.’—But in what sense could the Lamb that was slain wash them from their sins in his own blood, unless he were truly and literally an atoning sacrifice for them ? This likewise shows the vast importance of the doctrine in the Christian system. It is indeed essential to it: for he, who denies or overlooks it, cannot have the same judgment of the divine perfections, law, and government ; or of the evil and desert of sin, which real Christians have. He cannot approach God in the same way, or with the same plea. He cannot exercise the same kind of repentance or faith ; or feel himself under the same obligations, and influenced by the same motives, as they are. He cannot pray, or thank and bless God, for the same benefits ; or have the same reasons for gratitude, humility, patience and meekness. In a word, he cannot be meet for the same heaven ; but would dislike the company, dissent from the worship, and dishonour the employments and pleasures of those who ascribe all their salvation to the atoning blood of the Lamb. And is not this sufficient to prove that he cannot possibly be partaker of the hope, the love, the joy, which are peculiar to the religion of the crucified Emmanuel ?

It is however to be feared, that numbers assent to this doctrine, who neither understand its nature and tendency, nor are suitably influenced by it. The cross of Christ when contemplated by an enlightened mind, most emphatically teaches the glory and beauty of the divine character, the reasonableness and excellence of the moral law; the value of immortal souls, the vanity of earthly distinctions, the misery of the most prosperous transgressors, the malignity of sin, the lost estate of man, the presumption of every self-righteous confidence, the inestimable value of this foundation for our hope, the sinner's motives and encouragements to repentance, and the believer's obligations to the most self-denying and devoted obedience to his reconciled God and Father—He therefore, who truly believes, and spiritually understands this doctrine, and who glories in the cross of Christ alone, will habitually give his eternal concerns a decided preference to every worldly object. He will feel an earnest desire to promote the salvation of souls, especially the souls of those who are most dear to him. He will be 'crucified to the world, and the world to him.' He will repent of, hate, and forsake all his sins, and seek the crucifixion of every sinful propensity. Though he entirely renounces all other confidence, save in the unmerited mercy of God in Christ Jesus; he will yet deem it his pleasure, privilege, and honour to live 'to him who died for him and rose again.'—The example and love of Christ will reconcile him to reproach, contempt, self-denial, and persecution for righteousness' sake; and dispose him to forgiveness, love of enemies, enlarged benevolence, and whatever can 'adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour.'

Whilst we would therefore 'contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints;' we would also caution every one not to 'imprison the truth in unrighteousness.' They, who vilify the atonement, are not the only 'enemies of the cross of Christ:' for such as hold it in a carnal heart, and disgrace it by a sensual life, fall under the same condemnation. (Phil. iii. 18—21.) It is to be feared, that many, who are zealous against the fatal Socinian heresy, are tainted with the abominable infection of Antinomianism : and that numbers of another description, who contend for the doctrine of the atonement, do nevertheless rest their hope for salvation principally upon their own moral goodness, and not on the merits and expiatory sufferings of Christ. But as that 'God of all grace,' 'who spared 'not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all,' will 'with him freely give all things' to the true believer ; so assuredly he will not in his awful justice spare any of those, who oppose, neglect, or abuse his great salvation : for, 'our God is a consuming fire !'

ESSAY X.

On our Lord's Exaltation, and his Appearance in the presence of God for us.

WHEN our Saviour upon the cross was about to commend his Spirit into the Father's hands, he said 'It is finished.' Whatever the types had prefigured, or the prophets foretold, concerning his obedience, conflicts, and sufferings ; whatever the glory of God, the honour of the law, or the rights and satisfaction of divine justice, required ; and whatever was necessary, in order to his own final victory, triumph, and exaltation at the right hand of the Father in our behalf, was then fully accomplished ; that is, as far as it could be, previously to his death, which immediately followed. He then became conqueror over the world, sin, and Satan, (triumphing over them even on the cross ; ) and having consecrated the grave by his burial, to be a sacred repository for the bodies of his disciples, he arose on the third day a mighty Victor over the King of Terrors : and at that crisis commenced the glory which was to follow his sufferings.

The evidences of our Lord's resurrection have been already considered ; (Essay I. p. 15—17.) the ends answered by the great event may here be briefly mentioned. He thus confirmed, beyond all reasonable doubt, every part of the doctrine he had taught ; proving especially that he was the Son of God, in that peculiar and appropriate sense, in which he had claimed that high relation to the Father, and for which he had been condemned as a blasphemer. He fully evinced, that his atonement had been accepted, and had effectually answered those great and gracious purposes for which it had been made. He thus became capable of possessing in our nature the mediatorial throne, which had been covenanted to him as the reward of his obedience and sufferings ; and to appear, as our Advocate and intercessor, in the presence of the Father : being our Brother, and glorying in that condescending relation to us. And finally, he was the first fruits of the general resurrection, the earnest and pledge of that grand and interesting event.

I shall not further enlarge on the circumstances of our Lord's resurrection, or the instructions that may be deduced from it : but as his mediation is naturally divided into two distinct parts, it regularly falls within the plan of this work, to consider at present that part which he now performs in his heavenly glory ; as we before did that which he fulfilled during his humiliation on earth. From the depth of his voluntary abasement, " he ascended far above all heavens, that he might fill all things." He then " led captivity captive, and received gifts for men, yea, for the rebellious also ; that the Lord God might dwell among them." (Ps. lxxviii. 18. Eph. iv. 7—16.) " For the heavens must receive him, until the restitution of all things." (Acts iii. 21.) " I go," says he to his disciples, " to prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you to myself, that where I am, there you may be also." (John xiv. 2, 3.) We will therefore, in this Essay, point out the purposes for which Jesus our Forerunner, " hath for us entered into heaven," and the means by which he prepares the way for our admission to the same place of holy felicity.

The royal prophet introduces Jehovah declaring with an oath, denoting " the immutability of his counsel," that the Messiah was constituted " a Priest for ever, after the order of Melchizedek ;" (Ps. cx. 4. Gen. xiv. 18. Heb. vii.) and the Apostle thence argues, that the Aaronic priesthood was never intended to be perpetual. Now Melchizedek's priesthood especially differed from that of Aaron, in that it united the regal power with the sacerdotal office ; which showed that the Messiah was to "be a Priest upon a throne :"

(Zec. vi. 9—15.) Before we proceed with the subject, however, I would observe, that it affords us a most conclusive proof of our Lord's Deity. The sacred historian makes no mention of Melchizedek's "father, mother, pedigree, beginning of life, or end of days;" but introduces him to our notice, with mysterious abruptness ; "being" says the Apostle, "made like unto the Son of God."
(Heb. vii. 13.) But in what sense could this circumstance render him "like the Son of God," or a proper type of him, except as it was a shadow of his eternal pre-existence? As man, he had beginning of life like his brethren ; and if He, who tabernacled in our nature, had been a pre-existent creature of the highest order, he must, nevertheless, have had beginning of life ; and the emphatic silence of Moses, respecting the birth of Melchizedek, could not have represented him, in any sense, as "like the Son of God."

The High-Priesthood of Christ, in the sanctuary above, first requires our consideration. On the great day of atonement, (Lev. xvi.) the High-Priest, (not arrayed in his robes of glory and beauty, but clad in linen garments like his brethren,) having offered the sin offerings for himself and for the people, entered the Holy of Holies, with the sprinkling of blood, and the burning of incense by the fire taken from the altar of burnt-offering ; and thus as Israel's typical intercessor, he appeared before the Mercy-seat, as in the presence of God, for them. From the holy nation a holy tribe was selected, from that tribe a holy family, and from that family a holy person ; (that is typically, and by consecration ;) yet even this individual, selected with such care and so many precautions, from the whole human race, was not allowed on pain of death to enter within the veil, or to approach Jehovah even on a Mercy-seat, except on one day in a year, nor on that day, without the previous offering of sacrifices, the blood of which he must sprinkle before the ark, whilst the smoke of the incense perfumed the holy place. The whole of this appointment was calculated to show, in the most significant manner, to what an immense distance from their Creator sin had removed fallen men; and how difficult it was to render their return, and re-admission to his favour, consistent with the honour of his infinite justice and holiness.

In like manner, our great High-Priest, laying aside his robes of light and majesty, appeared in the mean attire of our nature; and "was made in all things like unto his brethren," except as he was free from the least defilement of sin; and having on earth offered his one all-sufficient sacrifice, he ascended into heaven, to appear before the Mercy-seat, in the true sanctuary, in the immediate "presence of God for us, bearing our nature, and pleading in our behalf the merits of his perfect obedience and inestimable atonement; that we might be delivered from going down into the pit, through the ransom he had paid in our behalf *." The Apostle writing to the Hebrews, discusses this subject very fully, and shows in how many and important particulars the Antitype exceeded, and consequently differed from the Type.—With lively and joyful gratitude he expatiates on the compassion, faithfulness, and power of our great High-Priest, on his divine dignity, and his condescension in assuming our nature, and owning us as his brethren; on his sympathy with us in our sorrows and temptations; on the prevalency of his intercession, and the unchangeable nature of that office which he ever liveth to perform. He shows us, that, by the offering of his flesh, "the way into the holiest is laid open," and that we may now draw near with boldness, through the rended veil, to the Mercy-seat of our reconciled God; that by the blood of the new covenant, the heavenly things themselves are purified, (that is, they are not polluted by the admission of sinners to them, in this appointed way,) and that, "such a “ High-Priest became us,” or suited our cause, “ who was “ holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners.” In another Epistle, he grounds his defiance of all enemies principally on this doctrine, that Christ “ died, yea, rather is risen again, and is even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us * :” And to another church he shows, that “ through Him both Jews and Gentiles have access by one Spirit unto the Father † :” In like manner, John also thus instructs his Christian brethren, “ If any man sin, we have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous ; and he is the propitiation for our sins ; and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world ‡ .” Many other testimonies to the same effect might be adduced : but these may suffice to our present purpose, except as we advert to our Lord’s own words, when he says, “ I am the Door, by me whosoever enters in shall be saved § ;” and “ I am the Way, the Truth and the Life ; no man cometh to the Father, but by me ;” and to his prayer, in behalf of his disciples just before his crucifixion, which may be considered as the specimen and substance of his intercession, (John xvii.) From these Scriptures we learn, that sinners are not admitted in their own name, even to a Mercy-seat to supplicate pardon ; but in the name and through the intercession of Christ ; that their pleas must not be drawn from their own character, situation, or services, nor even from the general goodness and compassion of God, but wholly from the person, work, and merits of Emmanuel ; and that his pleas in their behalf are wholly deduced from what he hath done and suffered in their nature and for their benefit.

It is not necessary or proper for us to imagine any outward transactions, which accords to an high-priest burning incense, to an advocate pleading a cause, or to a friend and brother making intercession. Heavenly things are represented to our minds under such emblems, to give us

true ideas of their nature, not to convey to us adequate apprehensions of the manner of them. Thus Christ is represented as appearing in heaven, as a Lamb that had been slain, to instruct us in the reality and efficacy of his atonement; and his officiating as a Priest, or pleading as an Advocate, conveys similar instruction. Thence we may learn, that his interposition in our behalf through the merits of his obedience unto death, renders our sinful persons and services accepted with the Father, and secures to us deliverance from every enemy and evil, the supply of every want, and the eternal enjoyment of all felicity. Further than this we need not determine: He and the Father are One in essence, counsel, and will; and his mediation cannot but be effectual, in behalf of all who come to God through him. For it hath been repeatedly observed, (though opposers of these doctrines, either wilfully or carelessly, remain ignorant of it;) that the atonement and intercession of Christ were not intended to induce God to show mercy; but to render the exercise of his love to sinners consistent with the honour of his law, and the glory of his name; and this single proposition, well understood, suffices to prove whole volumes, that have been published on the subject, to be an empty contest with an imaginary opponent, and a triumph for an ideal victory. Whilst our Lord, therefore, directed his disciples to ask in his name, and promised that he would pray the Father for them; he also subjoined in another place, "I say not that I will pray the Father for you; for the Father himself loveth you; because ye have loved me, and have believed that I came out from God." (John xiv. 13—17. xvi. 26, 27.) His general plea in behalf of "all who come to God through him," suffices; nor is it necessary for the well-beloved Son of the Father to be particular, or to use importunity with him, to induce him to grant all covenanted blessings to his beloved children.

The intercession of Christ is, in its very nature, entirely different from the supplications, which we make for one another. When we pray, according to our duty, for our brethren and fellow sinners; our requests are admissible and acceptable only through his mediation. We do not come in our own name; we rest not our intercession on our own services; we make no claim to the mercy we ask, nor have any complete assurance that we shall prevail. If indeed our requests be duly presented, they will be accepted; and if they be not granted in the sense we meant them, they will return into our own bosom. But the intercession of Christ, for his disciples, is made in his own name, on the ground of his own merits and dignity, according to the covenant ratified with and by him, and with the absolute certainty of success.—This shows the sin and idolatry of worshipping, or coming to God through other mediators; for either these were sinners, that were brought to heaven through the merits and intercession of Christ; though they are thus addressed as his competitors; or they are created Angels, not at all related to us, and utterly destitute of every plea which they may urge in our behalf; having never been appointed to the mediatorial office, and never having thought of intruding into it. So that to worship Saints, and Angels, even as intercessors, is an ascription, to servants and creatures, of that honour which belongs to the only-begotten Son alone; and they, who thus dishonour “the Son, do not honour the Father that sent him.”

The intercession of Christ is presented in behalf of “all who come to God through him,” or “who pray in his name;” and all men are invited to return in this way to the Lord; assured that Christ will not refuse to maintain the cause of any one, whatever he hath been or is, who uprightly seeks the benefit of his mediation: there is however a sense, in which it is not general, but particular. If he intercede for those, who are now living without faith and prayer, or in the practice of sin, it will shortly appear by their repentance and conversion: for he never pleaded in behalf of those who continue to the last unbelieving and ungodly. (John xvii. 9—20.) The event shows that his intercession, therefore, is intended to give us “this confidence, that, if we ask any thing, according to the will of God, he heareth us :” (1 John v. 14, 15.) but it can form no just ground of encouragement to those who do not pray at all ; who come before God, not in the name of Jesus, but with other pleas ; who ask such things as God hath not promised ; or, whose prayers are mere lip-labour and hypocrisy.

We are then instructed to approach the Father, through the mediation of the Son, for the forgiveness of our sins, the acceptance of our persons and services, and all things immediately connected with eternal salvation ; and for all temporal benefits, as far as infinite wisdom sees them conducive to our real good. But especially we are encouraged in his name to pray for the Holy Spirit, to illuminate, renew, purify, comfort, and strengthen our souls ; to furnish us with that measure of spiritual gifts which our situations require ; and to support us under the trials to which we may be exposed. We also expect, that through this heavenly Advocate, our prayers for our friends, our enemies, our brethren, or the church at large, will be accepted and answered in the most desirable manner ; notwithstanding our unworthiness, and the imperfection of our duties ; that our praises and thanksgivings will ascend as a sacrifice well pleasing to God ; and that our feeble endeavours to serve and honour him, though in strict justice they merit condemnation, will receive a large and gracious reward.

But our exalted Redeemer not only appears “ in the presence of God for us,” as a merciful High-Priest, but also as a glorious King ; for he is a “ Priest, after the order of Melchizedek,” a King of Peace and of Righteousness. As a king he confers blessings and affords protection, he enacts laws, demands obedience, obtains victories, and exercises his authority ; and he will at length administer justice to the rational creation. “ All power,” says he, “ is given unto me, in heaven, and in earth.” (Matt. xxviii. 18.) “ The Angels, that excel in strength,” are “ his mighty Angels.” “ He is gone into heaven, and is at the right hand of God ; angels, authorities, and powers being made subject to him :” (1 Pet. iii. 22.) “ The Father hath set him at his own right hand in heavenly places, far above all principality, and power, and might, and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this world, but in that which is to come : and hath put all things under his feet ; and gave him to be head over all things to the church ; which is his body, the fulness of him that filleth all in all.” (Eph. i. 20—23. Phil. ii. 9—11.) “ He hath also committed all judgment unto him, that all men might honour him, even as they honour the Father.” (John v. 21—27. Rom. xiv. 10—12. 2 Thess. i. 7—10.) The expressions given and committed, with others of similar import, evidently relate to him, as Man and Mediator, and in no respect deduct from the energy of this language of the Holy Spirit : for who must He be originally who can receive in his delegated character such authority, and exercise such powers ? What creature could sustain the weight of that dominion, which rests on the shoulders of him, who was a “ child born, and a Son given unto us ?” (Isaiah ix. 6. 7.) No doubt He, of whom such things are spoken, is the mighty God, the Lord from Heaven, God manifest in the flesh ! That only, truly Man, should exercise absolute authority over all Angels, who serve him in ministering to his redeemed people ; that he should have the keys of death and the unseen world ; (Rev. i. 18.) and that the universal kingdom of nature and providence should be administered by Him, is a most surprising mystery : but that all this should subserve the good of such worthless creatures as we are, is most stupendous and inconceivable love ! And they might have very high thoughts of human nature, or very low apprehensions of the infinite God, who can suppose a mere man to be capable of such pre-eminent dignity and authority.

It is a firm ground of admiring and thankful exultation, that He, who is our Brother and friend, thus rules all worlds with absolute sway, is King of kings, and Lord of lords ; the rise, fall, and revolutions of empires are ordered by him ; he hath all hearts in his hand, and turneth them as he pleaseth. The Father “ hath set his King upon his holy hill of Zion," in defiance and contempt of the opposition of all those that say, "let us break his bands asunder, and cast away his cords from us;" and "with his iron rod he will dash them to pieces like a potter's vessel. Be wise, now, therefore, O ye kings; be instructed, ye judges of the earth: kiss the Son, lest he be angry, and ye perish from the way, when his wrath is kindled but a little." (Ps. ii.) The duration, prosperity, and termination of every man's life are appointed by him; and the doom of every soul. Storms and tempests, pestilences and earthquakes, are his servants; all nature obeys his word, of judgment or of mercy. Tyrants and persecutors accomplish his secret purposes, "howbeit they mean not so:" nor can deceivers, by their unwearied efforts, exceed the limits he assigns them. Even apostate spirits know his power, and reluctantly obey his mandate: when he was "in the form of a servant," a legion of them could not so much as possess a herd of swine without his permission; nor can any of them defeat his counsels, escape his detection, or avert his omnipotent vengeance.—"His riches are unsearchable;" "in him are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge;" "all the fulness of the Godhead dwells in him bodily;" yea, the fulness of the Spirit of wisdom, truth, power, and holiness; and "from his fulness do all his people receive." (Isaiah xi. 2—5. John i. 16. iii. 34. Col. ii. 3—9.) He governs all events in that manner, which may best promote the safety and happiness of his church, and of true believers. Therefore, "all things work together" for good to them that love God." "None can pluck <sup>you</sup> <sub>dey</sub> of them out of his hands;" (John x. 27—30.) "No weapons formed against them shall prosper." "Nothing shall separate them from the love of God." "Jehovah is their shepherd; they shall not want." Tribulations, temptations, persecutions, conflicts, yea, death itself, are instruments in the hands of Christ, to prepare them for "an exceeding and eternal weight of glory," and "in all things they will be made more than conquerors," until they be enriched with everlasting felicity.

But his power is equally formidable to obstinate unbelievers : all, who will not have Christ to reign over them, will be destroyed as his enemies : no refuge can be found from his intolerable indignation, no resistance made to his omnipotent Word. His kingdom shall endure through all ages, to the end of time : then his power will raise the dead : He will judge "the world in righteousness," and decide the eternal state of all mankind : and thus the design of his delegated authority being completely answered, he will, as Mediator, deliver up "the kingdom to God, even the Father ;" the absolute dominion of the Creator will be re-established, and "God will be all in all."

It scarcely need be observed, that the authority, protection, and munificence of our glorious King demand of us implicit and unreserved obedience. The faith, that welcomes his salvation, "worketh by love," and ensures a cheerful attention to his commands : all the precepts of Scripture are either the mandates of Christ our King to those that share the blessings of his peaceful rule ; or they constitute that law which is the ministration of death and condemnation. Though his commands coincide with the moral law ; yet they are modified differently, as addressed to sinners who seek salvation by him. The commands to repent, to believe, to pray, to observe his ordinances, and to love the brethren, are indeed contained in the comprehensive requirement of supreme love to God, and equal love to our neighbour ; yet they are only given to sinners through Christ and the Gospel ; and they alone are his true subjects, who submit to his authority, and from evangelical principles uprightly endeavour to obey his commandments, (Matt. vii. 21—28. John xiv. 21—23. xv. 14.)

We must likewise consider the ascended Redeemer, as the great PROPHET of his Church. He indeed personally performed the prophetic office on earth, during his humiliation ; but, as all the ancient Prophets were his servants and representatives ; so the Apostles, Evangelists, and penmen of the New Testament, were his delegates ; and so are all those who preach according to the Holy Scriptures. Christ is the great teacher of mankind ; the whole revelation of God is imparted to him ; he is the Word and Wisdom of the Father, and the Light of the world ; all who follow him have the light of life, all others abide in darkness ! Divine truth is repositied in him, as in a storehouse, for our benefit ; thence it is communicated to us through the Scriptures. The Holy Spirit was sent forth from him, to inspire Prophets, Apostles, and Evangelists ; and he still furnishes pastors and teachers for their work ; (for these are the gifts of the ascended Redeemer to rebellious man, Eph. iv. 8—16. John xvi 14—15.) Moreover, the same spirit prepares men's minds to receive the truth in faith, and love, and to understand its nature, glory, and tendency : thus he gives efficacy to the word, and applies his salvation to our souls. So that the Lord Jesus, as ascended on high, is the sole Prophet of the Church, and teaches his people, by his word, by faithful ministers, and by his Holy Spirit. They, therefore, who seek from him the knowledge of God, and of his truth and will, with a humble, teachable, believing, and obedient disposition, in the use of his appointed means, will be made wise to salvation ; preserved in proportion to the simplicity of their dependence from errors and delusions ; guided in the midst of the paths of judgment ; and instructed how to act, as circumstances may require, with discretion and propriety. But the self-wise of every description, and all who refuse to receive instruction from Christ, will be entangled in error, and given over to strong delusion, whatever their talents, opportunities, attainments, reputation, or assiduity may be, (Mat. xiii. 11—15.) And even believers will be left to fall into distressing mistakes, if at any time they lean to their own understanding, neglect to seek wisdom from this great Counsellor, or prefer the opinion of some favourite teacher, to the word of him who is the Truth itself.

These distinct offices of our glorified Lord cannot be separated, either in respect of his performance of them, or of our dependence on him. The self-righteous, and the self-wise may seem willing to own him as their King; whilst the one rejects him as a Prophet, and both of them refuse to come to God through him as their High-Priest: on the other hand, the antinomian may seem to rely on him as a Priest, whilst he determines that "he will not have him to reign over him." These and similar dependencies are mere delusions: for Christ rules as a Priest on his throne; he intercedes with regal authority; and he teaches his disciples to rely on his atonement and advocacy, to shelter their souls under his omnipotent protection, and to submit to his sovereign rule. He reveals as a Prophet, what he purchased and obtains as a High-Priest, and confers as a munificent Prince. The obedience which he requires of his subjects, he by his grace disposes and enables them to perform, and renders it accepted through his intercession. So that they, who truly receive him in one of these combined offices, receive him in them all.

In this manner our Lord prepares the souls of his people for the inheritance which he hath prepared for them; nor could the utmost efficacy of one of these distinct parts of his mediatorial undertaking, accomplish that gracious purpose. His sacrifice and intercession, indeed, render it consistent with the glory of God, to admit us sinners into his presence, to receive us to his favour, to make us his children, and to give us an inheritance in his own holy habitation: but how should we profit by this provision, did he not send forth his word, and his ministers to proclaim the glad tidings, to give the invitations, and to set before us his precious promises and new covenant engagements? How can we receive the advantage even of this revelation, without we understand and believe it? or how shall we credit such a humbling, spiritual message, except the eyes of our minds be opened by the Holy Spirit? How could we unholy creatures be made meet for this holy inheritance, without the influences of his new-creating Spirit? How could we overcome the powers of darkness, and all our enemies, if he did not fight for us? How could we meet the king of terrors, if he did not engage to support and deliver us ; and finally to raise our bodies, incorruptible, immortal, and glorious, to unite with our souls in the everlasting enjoyment of the love of our reconciled God and Father ?

We indeed may consider Christ as our Shepherd and Physician, or in many other characters illustrative of our dependence on him and obligations to him : yet they may all with propriety be referred to the offices of Prophet, Priest, and King, according to the old and scriptural distinction. These are comprised in his title, CHRIST, the MESSIAH, the Anointed of God ; as Prophets, Priests, and Kings were anointed under the typical dispensations of the Old Testament, (Lev. viii. 12. 1 Sam. x. 1. xvi. 13. 1 Kings xix. 16.)

Is this then our creed, our experience, and dependence ? Do we thus receive and rely on Christ our Prophet, Priest, and King ? and do we, in the patient obedience of faith and love, “ wait for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life ? ” (Jude 20, 21.) Our answer to these inquiries, as in the presence of our heart-searching Judge, is of the last importance ; for this and this only, is genuine Christianity.

ESSAY XI.

On Justification.

ALL things having been made ready for the salvation of sinners, in the Person and mediation of the great Redeemer ; it was also necessary, that the method, or medium, of appropriating this inestimable benefit, should be clearly and expressly revealed : and this leads us to the consideration of the Scriptural doctrine of Justification. I shall, therefore, in the present Essay, briefly explain the meaning of the words justify, and justification, as they are used by the sacred writers—show that we must be justified before God by faith alone—consider the peculiar nature of faith, and the manner in which it justifies—assign a few reasons, why justification and salvation are ascribed to this rather than any other holy dispositions or actions of the soul—and answer some of the more plausible objections to the doctrine.

The terms justify and justification are taken from the common concerns of life; and they are applied, with some necessary variation of meaning, to the dealings of God with his rational creatures; and especially to his admission of sinful men into a state of acceptance, and to the privilege of being thus accepted. They denote, therefore, that such persons are now dealt with, as if they were righteous; they are wholly exempted from those sufferings which are strictly speaking, penal, and intitled to the reward of perfect obedience; though in themselves they have merited no such reward, but on the contrary, have deserved the punishment denounced in the law against transgressors.—These are commonly said to be forensic terms; that is, they refer to the practice of courts of justice among men; and indeed they seem to have been originally taken from such transactions: yet this derivation gives us a very inadequate idea of their import. For when a man is charged with a crime before an earthly tribunal, he must either be condemned or acquitted: if he be condemned, he may be pardoned, but he cannot be justified; if he be acquitted he may be justified, but he cannot stand in need of pardon. Moreover, a criminal may be acquitted for want of legal evidence, or from other causes, when there can be no reasonable doubt of his guilt: yet no accusation for the same crime can be brought against him, though he is very far from being fully justified or admitted to the full enjoyment of those privileges that belong to an unsuspected member of civil society; nor would he be a proper person to be confided in, or advanced to a place of honour and responsibility. Whereas, if an accused person be fully justified from the charge brought against him; he suffers no degradation in his character, or disadvantage in his circum stances : his integrity is often placed in a more conspicuous light than before : he is considered as an injured man, and is frequently recommended by these circumstances to the favour and confidence of the prince, or of the people. Justification, therefore, in the original meaning of the word, is not only distinct from pardon, but is absolutely incompatible with it : it implies far more than the acquittal of an accused person : it is a declaration, that no charge ought to have been made against the man ; that he is justly entitled to all the privileges of a good citizen ; and that he is, and ought to be, admissible to every post of honour and emolument, even as if he had never been accused. The meaning of the word, in other concerns of life, is the same : if a man's character has been aspersed ; he is said to be completely justified, when the charge is entirely refuted, and proved malicious or groundless to the satisfaction of all that inquire into it.

On the other hand, our justification before God always connects with pardon, and implies that we are guilty : and we are justified as ungodly, "righteousness being imputed to us without works." (Rom. iv. 1—8.) If we had never sinned, we might have been justified before God by our own obedience, according to the common use of the word justification : no charge could have been brought or proved against us, nor should we have needed any forgiveness. But by breaking the holy law of God we have forfeited our title to the reward of righteousness according to the law, and have incurred the penalty of eternal misery. The justification, therefore, of a sinner, must imply something distinct from a total and final remission of the deserved punishment ; namely, a renewed title to the reward of righteousness, as complete and effective, as he would have had if he had never sinned, but had perfectly performed, during the term of his probation, all the demands of the divine law. The remission of sins would indeed place him in such a state, that no charge would lie against him : but then he would have no title to the reward of righteousness, till he had obtained it by performing, for the appointed time, the whole obedience required of him; for he would merely be put again into a state of probation, and his justification or condemnation would not be decided till that were terminated. But the justification of the pardoned sinner, gives him a present title to the reward of righteousness, independent of his future conduct, as well as without respect to his past actions. This is manifestly the scriptural idea of justification: it is uniformly represented as immediate and complete, when the sinner believes in the Lord Jesus Christ; and not as a contingent advantage, to be waited for till death or judgment: and the arguments, that some learned men have adduced, to prove that justification means nothing else than forgiveness of sins, only show that the two distinct blessings are never separately conferred. David for instance, says, "Blessed is the man, to whom the Lord will not impute iniquity;" (Ps. xxxii. 2.) and Paul observes that "David, describeth the blessedness of the man, unto whom God imputeth righteousness without works." (Rom. iv. 6.) This does not prove, that 'not imputing sin,' and 'imputing righteousness,' are synonymous terms; but merely, that where God does not impute sin, he does impute righteousness; and confers the title to eternal life, on all those whom he rescues from eternal death. (Acts xiii. 38, 39.) Indeed, exemption from eternal punishment, and a right to an actual and vast reward, are such distinct things, that one cannot but wonder they should be so generally confounded, as they are in theological discussions. It may, therefore, suffice to observe, that justification signifies in Scripture, that God hath given a sinner a right and title to eternal life, accounting him righteous by an act of sovereign grace; so that 'there is no condemnation for him;' but being thus justified, 'he is made an heir, according to the hope of eternal life.' (Tit. iii. 1—7.)

Every attentive reader of the Scriptures, especially of those epistles, which contain the last and fullest revelation of the truth and will of God to mankind, must observe in them an uniform declaration made, and strenuously insisted on as of the greatest importance, that ‘a man is justified ‘by faith without the deeds of the law.’ Many learned men have endeavoured to explain all such testimonies of the Mosaic law as distinguished from the Christian dispensation; and to confine their meaning principally to the abrogated ceremonies. But ‘is the knowledge of sin,’ by the ceremonial, or by the moral, law? Was the ceremonial law ‘the ministration of death, written and engraven ‘in stones?’ (2 Cor. iii. 7.) Did the apostle know this law to be spiritual, ‘holy, just, and good?’ Did ‘he delight ‘in it after the inner man?’ Did the Mosaic rites, or the tenth commandment, convince him that concupiscence was a sin, and slay his hope of justification by the law? (Rom. vii.) Did Christ redeem us from the curse of the ceremonial law alone, by being made a curse for us? (Gal. iii. 13.)—Such questions might easily be multiplied; and each of them formed into a regular argument, demonstrating the falsehood and absurdity of this opinion: but the compass of this Essay does not admit of it, nor is it necessary in so plain a case. No law in the universe can both justify and condemn the same person: if then no man hath always loved God with all his heart, and his neighbour as himself, no man can be justified according to the works of the moral law; for this most obvious and conclusive reason, because all are exposed to condemnation for breaking it. If no human action be more excellent than the law requires our whole conduct to be; then none of our works of righteousness can do any thing to reverse the condemnation that our sins have incurred: and if the best of our good works come short of perfection, and our best days are chequered with many sins, then we must continue to accumulate guilt and condemnation, as long as we remain under the law, and are judged according to it. So that by no works of any law whatsoever, can a transgressor of that law be justified in the sight of God.

These considerations may prepare our minds for attending more carefully to the language of the Apostle, in discoursing on this subject. He constantly insists upon it, that a man is justified by, and through, faith alone, and not by the deeds of the law. He even says without hesitation, ‘To him that worketh not, but believeth in him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted to him for righteousness.’ (Rom. iv. 15.) And he carefully distinguishes this way of justification from that by works: nay, opposes the one to the other as incompatible—‘Because the law worketh wrath:—therefore it is by faith, what it might be by grace.’ ‘And if by grace, then it is no more of works; otherwise grace is no more grace.’ (Rom. iv. 14—16. xi. 6.)—For this reason all they whom God justifieth are considered as ungodly. True faith is indeed the effect of regeneration, an important part of true godliness, and inseparable from all other holy exercises of the soul towards God: yet the believer, considered as he is in himself, according to the holy law, is liable to condemnation as ungodly; and is justified solely and entirely as viewed in Christ according to the gospel.

Even James, who in another sense shows, that ‘a man is justified by works and not by faith only;’ illustrates his doctrine by the example of Abraham, who was ‘justified by works, when he had offered Isaac his son upon the altar:’ and he then adds, ‘Seest thou, how faith wrought with his works? and by works was faith made perfect; and the Scripture was fulfilled which saith, Abraham believed God, and it was imputed to him, for righteousness:’ (Jam. ii. 20—26.) now these words were spoken many years before Abraham was called to sacrifice Isaac, yea, before Isaac was born. (Gen. xv. 6.) James therefore evidently meant that the true believer proves his profession to be sincere, and his faith living, by the fruits of holy obedience; and is thus justified before men on earth, and will be justified before the world at the last day, from that charge of hypocrisy which will be substantiated against all those who ‘say they have faith, and have not works.’ Unless we admit this interpretation, we shall find as much difficulty in reconciling James to himself, as some have done in reconciling Paul to him: for he adduces the same example, and quotes the same Scripture, in illustration of his point, that Paul did: and he supposed that he had confirmed the true doctrine of justification by faith, in thus distinguishing living from dead faith; and in showing that no faith could justify a man before God, which did not prove itself genuine, and justify the possessor before his neighbours, by influencing him to the practice of good works, according to the opportunity afforded him.

But the general doctrine, that ‘ a man is justified in the sight of God by faith alone,’ is too plain to need much proof. They, who regard the epistles of Paul, must know, that he not only asserts, but confirms, this doctrine by various arguments, illustrations, and examples. He declares that no man is justified in any other way; (Gal. iii. 11, 12.) that ‘ they, who seek righteousness, as it were, by the works of the law,’ stumble and fall, (Rom. ix. 30—33. x. 3—11.) and have no benefit from Christ and the gospel; (Gal. v. 2—6.) and that ‘ if any man or Angel, should preach any other gospel he would be accursed.’ (Gal. i. 8—10.) Indeed, those Scriptures, which do not immediately relate to justification, continually speak of faith as the grand distinguishing difference, between them that are saved and them that perish. In this way the Apostle evidently teaches us, that all the accepted servants of God under the Old Testament were justified by faith. (Heb. x. 38, 39. xi.) And the same is certainly implied, when he says, ‘ They that be of faith are blessed with faithful Abraham: for as many as are of the works of the law are under the curse.’ (Gal. iii. 8—14.)

The texts, in which propositions to this effect are contained, are more numerous than can easily be conceived by persons who have not particularly examined the subject; which may easily be seen by looking over the articles of faith, believe, and believing, in a good concordance. By faith we pass from death unto life; by faith we are saved; we walk, we stand, we work, we fight, and conquer; we come un'o God, we receive the Spirit, and we are sanctified by faith: and every thing pertaining to our peace, stability, fruitfulness, comfort, and eternal felicity, is evidently suspended on our faith, and inseparably connected with it, in a peculiar manner, and wholly different from the relation which they bear to any other holy disposition we possess, or act of obedience we perform. So that it is really surprising, that any, except avowed infidels or sceptics should deny the doctrine of justification by faith alone, whatever method they might adopt of explaining the meaning of the words faith and justification.

I shall therefore next proceed to consider the distinguishing nature and effects of faith, and the manner in which it justifies.—Some opposers of this fundamental doctrine attempt to explain it away, by representing faith as a compendious term, denoting the whole of that profession and obedience, which Christ requires of his disciples: so that they suppose, we are justified by embracing and obeying the gospel, as a mitigated law of works; and that Christ purchased for us the acceptance of sincere, instead of perfect obedience. Their definition of faith comprises in it repentance, love, and obedience; and on this plan it would at least be equally proper to say, that we are justified by our love and its fruits, as by our faith, if any distinction were admitted. How different is this to the language of the sacred oracles! Surely in this case we should be justified by “works of righteousness that we had done,” though not by the works of the law! It has not, however, yet been shown in what part of the New Testament this mitigated law may be found: for certainly nothing like it is contained in our Lord’s sermon on the mount, or in the preceptive part of the apostolical epistles! Neither are we told precisely what it requires, or what exact measure of obedience will justify a man according to it. It is not easy on this plan to understand in what sense Christ “magnified the law and made it honourable:” how “the law is established by faith:” for which of our sins the death of Christ atoned; (seeing the moral law is repealed, and a milder law given, by obedience to which we are justified:;) or how boasting can thus be excluded. In fact, this absurd sentiment totally makes void the holy, just, and good law of God; and alters the standard of our duty, from the exact requirements of the scriptural precept, to a vague indeterminate idea called sincere obedience, which may be modelled and varied according to the reasonings and inclinations of mankind: and thus it virtually sets aside both the law and the gospel. But as faith, in respect of justification, is not only opposed to the works of the law, but distinguished from repentance, hope, and charity, as exercised by believers; and as none of these, nor any kind or degree of obedience is ever said to justify a man in the sight of God: so we are warranted to decide without hesitation, that the Apostles never meant by faith such a compound of all the distinct parts of Christianity; and that this supposition would imply, that they used the most unsuitable and obscure expressions which could possibly have been devised. True faith no doubt inseparably connects with, or produces, all the other essential parts of Christianity: and in like manner, in a complete human body there are ears, hands, and feet, as well as eyes; yet the eyes alone can perform the function of seeing. Thus the tree produces the fruit, yet is distinct from it; and the stem or branches of the tree may answer purposes, for which the fruit, though valuable, is totally unfit. It is, therefore, a very different thing to say, that living faith is connected with repentance, works by love, and produces obedience; than to contend, that it includes them, and that we are justified by repentance, love, and obedience, as parts of our faith.

Others again suppose, that faith is nothing more, than an assent to the truth of Christianity; and that a Jew or Gentile, on embracing and professing the gospel, was freed from the guilt of his former sins; that being thus brought into a justified state, he would continue in it, or fall from it, according to his subsequent behaviour; and that his justification at the last day must be by his own works, if he escape final condemnation. But here again we inquire, how this system can consist with the very meaning of the word justify, or account righteous, when the sinner is merely put upon a new probation to work out a righteousness for himself? How it consists with believers “not coming into condemnation,” and “having eternal life?” How it excludes boasting? And where it is found in the sacred oracles? In fact, the dead faith, exploded by James, is thus brought forward for the sinner’s first justification; whilst the dead works of a mere formalist are generally meant by the obedience which is at last to justify such a believer: so that the sentiment verges on the one hand to an antinomian abuse of the gospel, and on the other to a pharisaical opposition to it.

Let us then hear the words of the inspired Apostle on this subject. “Therefore by the deeds of the law, shall no flesh be justified in the sight of God; for by the law is the knowledge of sin.—But now the righteousness of God without the law is manifested; being witnessed by the law and the prophets: even the righteousness of God which is by faith of Jesus Christ unto all, and upon all them that believe; for there is no difference, for all have sinned and come short of the glory of God: Being justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus.” (Rom. iii. 19—24.) What does he mean by the righteousness of God without the law, which was witnessed by the law and the prophets; and which is unto all, and upon all them that believe? He elsewhere says that “Christ is the end of the law for righteousness unto every one that believeth.” (Rom. x. 4.) His obedience unto death, as Emmanuel, God manifested in the flesh, in our nature, as our Surety, and in order to “bring an everlasting righteousness,” was infinitely valuable; and honoured the law of God more than the perfect obedience of all creatures ever could have done. It was predicted and prefigured in the law of Moses: and the prophets expressly testified it. “Surely, shall one say, In JEHOVAH have I righteousness, and strength.” “In JEHOVAH shall all the seed of Israel be justified, and shall glory.” “This is the name, whereby he shall be called, JEHOVAH OUR RIGHTEOUSNESS." (Is. xlv. 24, 25. Jer. xxiii. 6.) Can we then doubt the Apostle's meaning in the before cited passage? This righteousness of God is without the law, being entirely independent of our personal obedience, either before or after justification; it becomes ours "by faith in Christ Jesus." And in the next chapter we read of "righteousness imputed without works." (Rom. iv. 6) Is it not then plain, that "the righteousness of God is unto all that believe," by imputation? Thus likewise it is "upon all that believe;"—"for they have put on Christ." (Gal. iii. 27) 'God now looking on them, there appears nothing but Christ; they are as it were covered all over with him, as a man with the clothes he hath put on. Hence in the next verse it is said, they "are all one in Christ Jesus," as if they were but one person*.'

As our sins were imputed to Christ, and he endured the curse we deserved; so his righteousness is imputed to us, if believers, and becomes our title to the heavenly inheritance "He was made sin for us who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God in him." (2 Cor. v. 21.) The grand design of this stupendous plan is declared to be, that "God might be just, and the Justifier of him that believeth in Jesus;" while, "To him that worketh not, but believeth in him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness." (Rom. iii. 25—31. iv. 5.) In this respect, there is no difference; for all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God:" Nor can any man in the world be justified before him, except he receive the righteousness of God by faith.

But what then is faith? To answer this question, I would observe, that faith, or believing, in common language, implies credit given to a report, testimony, or promise; or confidence placed in any person: and almost all the affairs of life are conducted on this principle, that men in ordinary circumstances are entitled to a measure of credit and confidence. But “if we receive the witness of men, the witness of God is greater;” (1 John v. 9.) “The testimony of the Lord is sure, making wise the simple.” (Ps. xix. 7.) Divine faith is, therefore, a disposition readily to believe the testimony, and to rely on the promises of God. The Apostle Paul briefly calls it “the belief of the truth,” (2 Thess. ii. 12, 13.) of every revealed truth, and especially of “the word of the truth of the gospel:” and he defines “faith,” to be “the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen.” (Heb. xi. 1.) In general, faith gives implicit credit to the divine veracity, in respect of all the invisible things that God hath attested; some of which are past, as the creation, the fall of man, the deluge, the crucifixion and resurrection of Christ; others exist at present, as the all-pervading Providence, and all-seeing eye of God, and the intercession of Christ in heaven; and others are future, as the coming of Christ to raise the dead and judge the world, and the state of eternal retributions. But faith credits them all, and so receives the testimony of God, both respecting the evil and the good, that it realizes them to the mind, as if they were indeed perceivable by the bodily senses. But in its more particular exercise, it especially regards, embraces, realizes, and looks for the future blessings which God hath promised; and thus gives the soul, as it were, a present possession of things hoped for. The examples recorded in the chapter last referred to, evince that this faith always receives the divine testimony, not only as true, but as interesting in the highest degree: and thus, as a living principle, it influences a man to flee from, or provide against the threatened evil, and to pursue with earnestness and decision the promised good.

The record which God hath given us of his Son, and of eternal life in him, is the centre of revelation: faith therefore always pays a peculiar regard to it, and thus especially “sets to its seal that God is true,” (John iii. 14—21. 33—36. 1 John v. 10—13.) whilst unbelief makes him a liar. Other divine testimonies having shown a man that he is a lost sinner, deserving and exposed to the wrath of God; these discover to him his only refuge. The Holy Spirit, through the "belief of the truth," has "convinced him of sin;" and now "He glorifies Christ," and shows to the sinner's enlightened mind the nature, suitableness, and value of his salvation, as revealed in the word of the gospel. The Father, as it were, says to him, "This is my beloved Son—hear him:" and his heart answers, "Lord, I believe, help thou mine unbelief." He credits the testimony of God concerning the person and mediation of Emmanuel; he feels his need of the teaching of such a Prophet; of the deliverance and protection of such a king, and the blessings of his kingdom; and, above all, of the sacrifice, merits, and intercession of this great High-Priest. Faith in the divine testimony and promises, influences him to intrust his soul and all his eternal interests, into the hands of Christ, relying on his power, truth, and love; he comes to the Father through him, and in his name: he shelters his soul from the wrath of God, and the curse of the law, under the protection of his atoning blood: he confides in his power and grace to deliver him from all his outward and inward foes; he sits at the Redeemer's feet, to hear and observe his directions; he lives by faith in him for every thing; and this faith working by love, and learning daily lessons from his word, and from the cross, gives him the victory over the fear of man and the love of the world, increases his humiliation and hatred of sin, and furnishes him with motives, encouragements, and assistance for all holy obedience.

But whatever faith may effect as the active principle of a man's conduct; it justifies him before God only as it receives Christ Jesus, applies to him for salvation, constitutes the sinner's relation to him, and interests the soul in his righteousness and atonement, and in all the promises of the new covenant. The operations and effects of this precious faith serve to distinguish it from a worthless dead faith, but do nothing towards our justification; for we are justified, as One with Christ; on which account it is meet that we should share his purchased blessings; whilst he, that hath not faith, stands in no such relation to him, and is not at present intitled to such distinguished advantages, whatever may be the secret purposes of God respecting him. Yet all who have this faith do repent, do love the Lord and his people, and uprightly obey his commands; by which they are distinguished from mere professors.

We must not then suppose, that we are justified by the merit of our faith, any more than by that of our good works; for though true faith is pleasing to God, because honourable to his name; yet it cannot atone for sin, or purchase heaven: nay, the imperfection of our faith would condemn us, if we were to be judged according to the merit of it. But “we are justified by faith alone;” because by it alone we receive, and become interested in, that righteousness in which we are accepted with God. This righteousness of God, having been devised, appointed, wrought out, and revealed, for this very purpose, is fully sufficient to justify all who are interested in it, how numerous soever they are, or how vile soever they have been.

Hence it is that Paul uses such decisive language on this subject: “What things were gain to me, those I counted loss for Christ: yea, doubtless and I count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord, for whom I have suffered the loss of all things, and do count them but dung that I may win Christ, and be found in him; not having mine own righteousness, which is of the law, but that which is of the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith,” (Phil. iii. 3—9)

It appears, therefore, that free grace, (or the gratuitous favour, sovereign love, or everlasting mercy of God,) is the source of our justification; that the righteousness and atonement of Emmanuel are the meritorious cause of it; and that faith is the only recipient of the blessing; and we are “justified by his blood,” (Rom. v. 9.) because by shedding his blood he completed his obedience, as our Surety. Justification may therefore be ascribed, either to the source, to the meritorious cause, or to the recipient of it; even as a drowning person may be said to be saved, either by the man on the bank of the river, or by the rope cast out to him, or by his hand apprehending the rope ; according to the different ways in which we speak on the subject.

The manner in which faith justifies, may be illustrated, by considering in what sense a bank note pays a demand made on any person. The intrinsic value of the paper is not one farthing ; but it refers the creditor to a company who are engaged and competent to answer the demand ; and therefore it is accounted to the debtor as so much paid in specie. Thus faith refers God the Father to Christ, who is able and willing to answer for every believer ; and, therefore, “ it is imputed to us for righteousness.” So that, if a man should die, immediately after the first exercise of true faith, (as the thief on the cross did,) and before he had time to perform one further act of obedience ; he would directly enter heaven as a justified person : though all who are spared, will certainly show their faith by their works. Nor can there be a doubt, but that the faith of Abraham, and that of ancient believers, had a similar respect to the promises and testimony of God, concerning a Redeemer who was to come ; or that it justified them in exactly the same manner.

The Scriptures inform us, that “ the only wise God, our Saviour,” hath appointed this method of justification, that the benefit might be of grace : for faith of that nature which hath been described, expressly renounces all claim in the way of merit. It allows “ that by the works of the law, no “ flesh can be justified in the sight of God ;” it comes to him, not to buy, earn, or demand a recompense, but to crave mercy, the gift of righteousness, and the gift of eternal life through Jesus Christ ; and in that way, by which the desert of sin and the justice of God were most clearly displayed to the universe. So that in this method “ of justifying the ungodly ” by faith alone, the whole glory is secured to the Lord ; and his justice, holiness, truth, and wisdom, as well as his abounding grace, are explicitly acknowledged and honoured. And as faith itself is the gift of God, whilst the weakest faith justifies as certainly as the strongest, (though it does not bring such evidence of it to the conscience,) so boasting is excluded, every ground of self-preference is removed, and a foundation is, as it were, laid in the believer's heart, for the constant exercise of humility, dependence, patience, and meekness; and of that love, which constrains the redeemed sinner "to live no longer to himself, but to him that died for him and rose again."

But it may be objected, that the Scriptures frequently speak of repentance, conversion, love, obedience, doing the will of God, and forgiveness of enemies, as requisite in order to our acceptance and admission to the enjoyment of our heavenly inheritance; and how can this consist with the doctrine of justification by faith alone? No doubt these things are necessary; nay, there is no salvation without them, according to the time and opportunity afforded: nor does any man come short of salvation in whom they are found. These are things which accompany salvation; (Heb. vi. 9.) they either prepare the heart for receiving Christ by faith, or they are evidences that he is thus received: yet Christ himself is our whole salvation, and faith alone receives him and appropriates the blessing; not by believing without evidence that Christ is ours; but by applying to him, according to the word of God, that he may be ours.

Should it be further objected, that the decision of the day of judgment is always stated to be made "according to men's works;" it may suffice to answer in this place, that no faith justifies, except that which works by love; that love uniformly produces obedience; and that the works thus wrought will certainly be adduced, as evidences in court, to distinguish between the true believer and all other persons.—Finally, the objection, that this doctrine tends to licentiousness, seems to have been already sufficiently answered, by the explanation given of the nature and effects of saving faith; and I shall only add a most earnest exhortation to all, who hold this doctrine, to walk so circumspectly, "that, whereas, men speak evil of them,

“ as evil doers ; they may be ashamed that falsely accuse
 “ their good conversation in Christ,” (1 Pet. ii. 12.iii. 16.)

Thus having explained the doctrine of justification by faith alone, “ through the righteousness of God, even of our Saviour Jesus Christ,” (2 Pet. i. 1.) and proved it to be that of the Holy Scriptures ; I would conclude by reminding the reader of its vast importance.—“ How shall man be just with God ? ”—All our eternal interests depend on the answer, which, in our creed and experience, we return to this question : for if God hath, for the glory of his own name, law, and government, appointed a method of justifying sinners, and revealed it in the gospel ; and they, in the pride of their hearts, refuse to seek the blessings in this way, but will come for it according to their own devices ; he may justly, and will certainly, leave them under merited condemnation, (Rom. x. 1—4.) May God incline every reader to give this subject a serious consideration, with the day of judgment and eternity before his eyes ! Nor let it be forgotten, that all the reformers from popery, (who were eminent men, however some may affect to despise them,) deemed the prevailing sentiments concerning the way of a sinner’s justification before God, to be the grand distinction between a standing and a falling church.

Yet we should also observe, that “ the truth itself may be held in unrighteousness : ” and they who receive this doctrine into a proud and carnal heart, by a dead faith, not only awfully deceive themselves, and quiet their consciences in an impenitent unjustified state ; but bring a reproach upon the truth, and fatally prejudice the minds of men against it, of which they will have a dreadful account to give at the last day. For did all, who profess and argue for this “ doctrine of God our Saviour,” adorn it by such a conduct, as it is suited to produce, Pharisees, Sceptics, and Infidels would be deprived of their best weapon, and must fight against the Gospel at a vast disadvantage. May the Lord give us all that “ faith which worketh by love,” that “ by works our faith may be made perfect ; ” as the grafted tree is in its most perfect state, when every branch is loaded with valuable fruit, (Gal. v. 6. James ii. 17—26.)

ESSAY XII.

On Regeneration.

WHEN the Apostle had reminded the Ephesians, that “they were saved by grace, through faith ;” he added, “and that not of yourself ; it is the gift of God. Not of works lest any man should boast.” (Eph. ii. 8—10.) Hence we learn, that faith itself, the sole recipient of all the blessings of salvation, is the effect of a divine influence upon the soul ; that all real good works are the effect of a new creation ; and that it is the Lord’s express design, by these means, effectually to exclude boasting, “that no flesh should glory in his presence.” This gracious operation of a divine power in changing the heart is represented in Scripture under several metaphors, of which Regeneration, (or being born again, born of God, and born of the Spirit,) is the most frequent and remarkable ; and the present Essay will be appropriated to the discussion of this interesting subject.

Nicodemus, a Pharisee, a scribe, and a member of the Jewish sanhedrim, came to our Lord by night : for notwithstanding his conviction that Jesus was a Teacher sent from God, he was afraid or ashamed of being known to consult him, concerning the doctrine that he came to inculcate. The state of his mind accorded to the darkness which prevailed at the season of this interview : and he seems to have expected some instructions coincident with the traditions of the Pharisees, and their ideas of religion and of the Messiah’s kingdom, which they supposed to consist in external forms and advantages. But our Lord, with a two-fold most solemn asseveration, peculiar to himself on the most important occasions, abruptly assured him, that “except a man were born again, he could not see the kingdom of God ;” or discern its real nature and excellency: and when Nicodemus expressed his astonishment at this assertion, in language aptly illustrating the Apostle's meaning, when he says, "The things of the Spirit of God are foolishness to the natural man;" (1 Cor. ii. 14.) our Lord answered with the same solemnity, that, "except a man were born of water and of the Spirit, he could not enter into the kingdom of God." Water had been used in divers ways, as an external emblem of internal purification; and the use of it was intended to be continued, in the ordinance of baptism, under the new dispensation: it was therefore proper to mention it as the outward sign of that change, which could only be effected by the power of the Holy Spirit.—Our Lord next showed the indispensable necessity of this new birth. "That which is born of the flesh," or derived by natural generation from fallen Adam, "is flesh," or carnal in its propensities and inclinations; "and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit," or spiritual, holy, and heavenly, like its divine author. (Rom. viii. 1—16.) He then told Nicodemus not to wonder at his declaration, that even Jews, Pharisees, and Scribes "must be born again;" and he illustrated the subject by the wind, the precise cause of which, in all its variations, cannot easily be ascertained, nor its motions and energy altered or abated; but which is very manifest in its powerful effects. And when Nicodemus still inquired "how these things could be?" he in return expressed his surprise, that a teacher of Israel should be at a loss about such a subject! and concluded by representing this part of his instructions as "earthly things," when compared with the deep mysteries of his Person and Redemption, which he afterwards declared to him as "heavenly things." For this change takes place on earth continually, even as often as sinners are turned from their evil ways, and become truly pious and holy persons: it may very aptly be illustrated by the most common concerns of life: it lies as level to our capacities, (if our minds were unprejudiced,) as almost any of the works of God with which we are surrounded: and the necessity of it may be proved by as cogent and conclusive arguments, as any thing of a worldly nature can be.—The question then is, ‘What did our Lord mean by being born again, or born of the Spirit?’ To this I shall endeavour to give a plain and particular answer; subjoining a compendious review of the arguments, by which the necessity of regeneration hath been often proved; and concluding with some observations and inferences of a practical nature and tendency.

It hardly need be said, that the ordinance of baptism, however administered, is not “regeneration by the Spirit.” They, who resolve all that is said in Scripture on this head into the observance of an external rite, must suppose that none can enter Christ’s church on earth, or his kingdom in heaven, or even understand the real nature of them, unless they have been baptized with water; whatever be their character or the cause of the omission: nay, they must likewise consider all baptized persons as truly illuminated, real Christians and heirs of heaven; for all that are born of God are his children and heirs. No doubt baptism is, (as circumcision was,) the outward sign of regeneration: but they who are satisfied with the outward sign without the inward and spiritual grace, should return to school or to the nursery, and learn over again a part of their catechism, which they have no doubt forgotten: for it expressly states the inward and spiritual grace of baptism to be ‘a death unto sin, and a new birth unto righteousness.’ Indeed the fathers, as they are called, (that is, the teachers of the Christian church, during some ages after the death of the Apostles.) soon began to speak on this subject in unscriptural language: and our pious reformers, from an undue regard to them and to the circumstances of the times, have retained a few expressions in the liturgy, which not only are inconsistent with their other doctrine; but also tend to confuse men’s minds, and mislead their judgment on this important subject. It is obvious, however, from the words above cited, and many other passages, that they never supposed the mere outward administration of baptism to be regeneration, in the strict sense of the word: nor can any man, without the most palpable absurdity, overlook the difference between the baptism that is "outward in the flesh," and that of the heart, by the Spirit, whose praise is not of men but of God. (Rom. ii. 29. 1 Pet. iii. 19.)

Nor does regeneration merely signify a reformation of the outward conduct, or a ceasing from vice to practise virtue. Some persons have been so preserved from immoralities, that they do not want such an outward reformation, as is meant by those who favour this interpretation: yet they as well as others must be born again, or they can neither see, nor enter into, the kingdom of God. Indeed, if the strong language, and multiplied figures of the Scripture on the subject, mean nothing more than this; we must be constrained to allow, that the plainest matter in the world is so covered and obscured by mysterious language, as to render it extremely perplexing, and even unintelligible, to ordinary readers; for how should they suppose, according to the dictates of unlettered common sense, that such solemnity of introduction, emphasis of expression, and accumulation of metaphors only meant, that a wicked man could not be an heir of heaven, unless he amended his life? For who, except avowed infidels or profligates, ever supposed that he could?

Neither is regeneration merely a conversion from one creed or sect to another; or even from atheism, Judaism, infidelity, or idolatry, to Christianity. A man might pass through changes of this kind, till he had tried all the modes of religion that have been known on earth; and yet at last be excluded as unregenerate and unclean from the kingdom of heaven.—On the other hand, it does not consist in any kind of impressions, or new revelations; any succession of terrors or consolations; or any whisper, as it were, from God to the heart concerning his secret love, choice, or purpose to save a man. Many such experiences have been declared by those, who still evidently continued the slaves of sin; and Satan, transformed into an angel of light, has done immense mischief in this way ; for the confidence of these persons seems in general to be rather the effect of a strong delusion, and self-flattery, than an express design of imposing on other men. Some of these things indeed, (as terror and consolation succeeding it,) commonly accompany a saving change : others, which are evidently enthusiastic, may nevertheless be found in the case of some who are really born of God ; yet they are neither regeneration itself, nor any effect or evidence of it ; but rather a disgraceful and injurious appendage to it, arising from human infirmity and the devices of Satan.

If we allow the expressions, born of God, or born again, to be figurative, we must also contend, that the metaphor is significant and proper. A new-born infant is a new creature, brought into the world by almighty Power, endued with life, and with certain propensities and capacities. It is a human being, and has all things pertaining to our nature in a weak and incipient state : but by proper care and sustenance, it may grow up to maturity, and the perfection of manhood.—In like manner, the divine power produces in the mind of a sinner such a change as renders him a new creature, with new propensities and capacities : but these are only in a feeble and incipient state, and exposed to much opposition and danger on every side. Provision is made for “ this new-born babe, in “ the sincere milk of the word,” and in the salvation of Christ ; by means of which, through the grace of the Holy Spirit, the regenerate man grows up gradually to maturity.—No new faculties are communicated in this change, as some pious persons have inaccurately stated ; by which the subject has been rendered less intelligible, and an opening given to many plausible objections : but a new and heavenly direction is given to all those faculties which the Creator had bestowed, but which sin had perverted. The capacity of understanding, believing, loving, and rejoicing, previously belonged to the man’s nature : but the capacity of understanding the real glory and excellency of heavenly things, of believing the humbling truths of revelation in an efficacious manner, of loving the holy beauty of the divine character and image, and of rejoicing in God's favour and service, belong to him as born of the Spirit.

Regeneration may then be defined—'A change wrought by the power of the Holy Spirit, in the understanding, will, and affections of a sinner, which is the commencement of a new kind of life, and which gives another direction to his judgment, desires, pursuits, and conduct.'—The mind seems to be first prepared by a divine energy, (like the removal of a film or other obstruction from the eyes of a blind man,) to perceive the real nature and comparative value of the objects around him, and of those proposed to him by the gospel; concerning which, through the ignorance and depravity of his fallen nature, the corrupt maxims of the world, and the artifices of Satan, he had formed a very erroneous judgment. Thus the eyes of his understanding are opened; and the light of divine truth shines into his heart, and gradually rectifies his errors and misapprehensions. (Acts xvi. 14. xxvi. 18. Eph. i. 18.) The will and affections also are influenced in the same manner: and the man feels a disposition to fear, hate, and shun what he before delighted in, or regarded as harmless; and to love, choose, desire, and rejoice in those things, that before he despised or hated. He seems to be introduced, as it were, into a new world, in which he views himself, and all things around him, through a new medium. He wonders that he had not before seen them in the same light: and frequently he is so amazed at the insensibility or delusions of mankind, that he imputes them to mere ignorance, and imagines that proper instructions would bring them all over to his sentiments; nor is he easily convinced of his mistake. He now possesses as it were a whole system of affections, of which he formerly had no conception: his fears and hopes, attachments and aversions, joys and sorrows, successes and disappointments, principally relate to those things which before gave him scarcely any concern; but which now appear to him of such vast importance, that the objects which once engrossed his mind, proportionably dwindle into insignificancy, even where he does not see them to be criminal, polluting, and ensnaring. Hence it often happens that the new convert grows inattentive to such matters, deeming them comparatively mere trifles; and can only be retained in his station, or engaged to be diligent in worldly business, by a sense of duty, and a regard to the honour of the gospel.

It is not to be expected, that we should be capable of explaining the manner in which the Holy Spirit effects this internal change: for we cannot understand how God creates and forms the body in the womb, or how he breathes into it the breath of life. It is of more importance for us to point out with precision those special effects, by which regeneration is distinguished from all counterfeits.—Among these special effects we may first mention, an habitual and prevailing regard to the authority, favour, displeasure, and glory of God, in the general tenor of a man's conduct, even when most remote from human observation; an abiding sense of his all-seeing eye, his constant presence, and his all-directing and sustaining providence; and an unwavering persuasion of his right to our worship, love, and service, and of our obligations and accountability to him. Connected with this, regeneration always produces a deep and efficacious apprehension of the reality, nearness, and importance of eternal things, and our infinite concern in them; so that compared with them, all temporal things appear as nothing. This will be accompanied with a new disposition to reverence, examine, believe, and submit to the decisions of the holy Scriptures; yea, a desire after them, and delight in them, as the proper nourishment of the soul. (1 Pet. ii. 2.)

If the person who has recently experienced this saving change, had been previously destitute of religious knowledge, he will find, that an increasing acquaintance with the holiness of God and his obligations to him; with the reasonableness, spirituality, and sanction of the divine law; and with his own past and present conduct, dispositions, motives, and affections, as compared with this perfect standard; lead him to a deeper conviction of his sinfulness, exposedness to deserved wrath, inability to justify or save himself, and need of repentance, forgiveness, and the influences of divine grace: and if he before had some measure of doctrinal knowledge; the truth that had lain dormant, will now become a living principle of action in his soul. Thus self-dependence and every towering imagination will be cast down; all his supposed righteousness will be found to have sprung from corrupt motives, and to have been both defective and defiled; and whatever his previous character may have been, "God be merciful to me a sinner," will be the genuine language of his heart. So that deep humiliation and self-abasement, a broken and contrite spirit, godly sorrow, repentance, and conversion to God, are the never-failing effects of regeneration.

Thus the divine Saviour, and his merits, atonement, and mediation, become glorious in the eyes, and precious to the heart of the regenerated sinner: he now perceives in some degree the wisdom, and feels the power of the doctrine of the cross which before he deemed foolishness: he "counts all but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ," and gladly receives him, as his Prophet, Priest, and King. (John i. 12, 13. 1 John v. 1.) He learns to love him whom he once slighted and despised: he begins to admire the excellency of his character, to value his favour, and to desire communion with him above all things; to be thankful for his unspeakable love and inestimable benefits; to be zealous for his honour, and devoted to his cause; to love the brethren for his sake, and his neighbours and enemies after his example; (1 John iii. 14. iv. 21.) and to exercise self-denial, and to endure loss, hardship, or suffering in his service. By degrees he is even enabled to say with the Apostle, "God forbid that I should glory save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified to me, and I unto the world." (Gal. vi. 14.) "For whatsoever is born of God overcometh the world, and this is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith.

Who is he that overcometh the world, but he that believeth that Jesus is the Son of God." (1 John v. 4, 5.)

The Apostle John mentions in a detached manner several other peculiar effects of regeneration—"Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin: for his seed remaineth in him; and he cannot sin, because he is born of God." "In this the children of God are manifest, and the children of the devil: whosoever doeth not righteousness, is not of God, neither he that loveth not his brother." (1 John iii. 9, 10.) "Ye know that every one that doeth righteousness is born of him." "We know that we have passed from death to life, because we love the brethren:" for "Every one that loveth is born of God and knoweth God." "We know that whosoever is born of God sinneth not." (1 John ii. 29. iii. 14. iv. 7. v. 18.) Thus all the regenerate may adopt the Apostle's words, "With open face beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord; we are changed into the same image, from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord." (2 Cor. iii. 17, 18.) So that repentance, faith in Christ, love of God and man, love of the brethren in an especial manner, deliverance from the dominion of sin and Satan, victory over the world, abhorrence of evil, patience, meekness, spirituality, temperance, justice, truth, purity, and all the fruits of the Spirit, are the genuine effects of that change, without which "no man can see," or "enter into the kingdom of God;" though the whole is imperfect in the degree, and counteracted by the remaining power of in-dwelling sin and manifold temptations.

That this is the real meaning of this scriptural expression, may be further evinced, by briefly considering several other metaphors which express the same change. It is called a new creation.—"If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature; old things are passed away; behold all things are become new!" (2 Cor. v. 17.) The Apostle speaks of it, with allusion to the creation of the world, "God who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined into our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of his glory in the face of Jesus Christ." Thus educating likewise, order out of confusion, and beauty out of deformity. (2 Cor. iv. 6.) "In Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision, but a new creature," or a new creation: "for we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works." (Gal. vi. 15. Eph. ii. 10. iv. 24.)

It is also a resurrection.—There are, so to speak, three kinds of life; animal, rational, and spiritual. Animal life implies the capacity of performing animal functions and relishing animal pleasures, which man possesses in common with brutes: rational life rises a degree above this, and includes the capacity of rational investigation, and of relishing intellectual pleasure, of which mere animals have no conception; this, man possesses in common with unembodied spirits: but spiritual life is a still nobler distinction, and the perfection of created being; as it consists in the capacity of performing, and delighting in spiritual actions, in which angels find their chief felicity, but of which the most rational man in the world, who is not born again, is as entirely incapable as the brutes are of philosophy. Animal life may subsist without either intellectual or spiritual capacities; these may subsist apart from animal propensities; and an intelligent agent may be destitute of spiritual capacity, as fallen angels are: but spiritual life presupposes rational powers. Adam, created in the image of God, possessed them all: but when he sinned he lost his spiritual life; for the Spirit of life departed, and he became dead in sin. From that time he had possessed the propensities of animal nature, and the capacities of an intelligent agent: but he became incapable of delighting in the spiritual excellency of divine things; and this is the condition of every man until "the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus makes him free from the law of sin and death," (Rom. viii. 2.) by that spiritual resurrection of which we speak. (Rom. vi. 4. Eph. ii. 1. 5, 6. Col. iii. 1.)

ple a new heart, and a new spirit; “a heart of flesh instead of a heart of stone ;” and “to write his law in the heart :” (Ezek. xi. 19, 20. xxxvi. 25—27. Jer. xxxi. 31—33.) and this must certainly imply such an entire change wrought in the judgment, dispositions, and affections, as constitutes a preparation for obeying “not by constraint but willingly.” This is also described as “putting off,” or “crucifying the old man ;” “crucifying the flesh with its affections and lusts.” “putting on the new man, being transformed by the renewing of our mind ; or “renewed in the spirit of our mind, and putting on a new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness.” (Rom. xii. 2. Gal. v. 24. Eph. iv. 22—24. Col. iii. 9, 10.) These expressions especially teach us, that regeneration is the beginning of a fallen creature’s recovery to that rectitude of soul, and conformity to the holy image of God, in which he had at first been created, but which had been lost by sin. In this view David prayed, “create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me.” (Ps. li. 10.) This same renovation is likewise spoken of by Moses when he says, “The Lord thy God will circumcise thine heart, and the heart of thy seed, to love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, that thou mayest live ;” and in many other places it is mentioned under the same image. (Deut. xxx. 6. Act. vii. 51. Rom. ii. 28, 29. Col. ii. 11.) It is also represented by the grafting of a tree, through which the nature of it is changed and meliorated, and made to bear good fruit.—These and such like metaphors and similitudes abundantly illustrate and confirm the explanation that hath been given of regeneration : but can never be made to coincide with the sentiments of those, who explain it of an outward form or amendment ; or of such, as mistake some transient impressions or emotions, for this abiding renovation of heart.

The necessity of regeneration might indeed be entirely rested on the solemn and repeated declarations of the Saviour and Judge of men : for those multitudes, who hope for heaven while they pay no regard to this part of Scripture, strangely presume, either that Christ was mistaken, or that he will depart from his word in their favour! But other conclusive proofs may be adduced, that "except a man be born again, he cannot enter the kingdom of God;" which result from the nature of God and of man, of true religion, and of happiness.

No creature can be satisfied, unless its capacities of enjoyment coincide with its sources of pleasure, or unless it subsist in its proper element. The various kinds of animals are perfectly satisfied with their several modes of living, while unmolested and sufficiently provided for: but they are uneasy when out of their place, though in a situation which pleases other creatures. Different men also have different tastes: none is comfortable, unless his inclination be gratified: and every one is apt to wonder, what pleasure others can take in that which is irksome to him. But who is there, that naturally takes delight in the spiritual worship and service of God? Are not these things man's weariness and aversion? And do not men in general deem those persons melancholy, who renounce other pleasures for the sake of them? That "which is born of the flesh, is flesh," or carnal; "and the carnal mind is enmity against God;" whose holy perfections, spiritual law and worship, sovereign authority, and humbling truth, are disliked by all unregenerate men, in proportion as they become acquainted with them. This is manifest, not only from the vices of mankind, but from the prevalence of idolatry, infidelity, superstition, and impiety: for men have, in every age, almost with one consent, preferred any absurdity to the truths, precepts, and ordinances of revelation! and every base idol to the Holy One of Israel!

Indeed, they who carefully watch their own hearts, while they think seriously of the omnipresence, omnipotence, omniscience, justice, holiness, truth, and sovereignty of God; of his laws, threatenings, and judgments; and of their own past and present sins, will find “a witness in themselves,” to the enmity of the carnal mind against God. So that except a man be born again, he cannot take any pleasure in God, nor can God take any pleasure in him : he cannot come to him or walk with him : (Amos iii. 3.) he cannot render him unfeigned praises and thanksgivings ; but must either neglect religion, or be a mere formalist. He can neither deem the service of God perfect freedom, and regard it as his privilege, honour, and happiness ; nor exercise unfeigned repentance for all his sins ; but in part at least, he will exalt himself, palliate his crimes, object to the severity of God, and murmur at his appointments. He cannot cordially receive the gospel, or live by faith in Christ for “wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption ;” nor perceive the preciousness of his person, mediation, and kingdom, the glory of his cross, his unsearchable riches, and incomprehensible love. It is impossible that he should unfeignedly give the Lord the whole glory of his salvation ; or practise, from proper motives, meekness, patience, gratitude, forgiveness of injuries, and love of enemies ; or count all but loss for Christ, renounce all for him, bear reproach and persecution for his sake, devote himself to his service, even unto death ; and then at last receive eternal life as the free gift of God in him. Nor can he enter into the spiritual meaning of divine ordinances, (especially of baptism and the Lord’s supper ; ) or seek the spiritual blessings of the new covenant with decided preference ; or love the true worshippers of God as the excellent and honourable of the earth. Nay, an unregenerate man would not savour the company, the work, the worship, or the joy of heaven ; but would be disgusted even with the songs and employments of Angels, and the spirits of just men made perfect ; as persons of different descriptions must know, if they would but carefully consider the subject, and reflect on the state and thoughts of their own hearts. But the nature of God, of holiness, of happiness, and of heaven, is unchangeable ; and therefore, either we must be changed, or we cannot be either holy or happy.

All the Scriptures above referred to imply, that regeneration is wrought by "the exceeding greatness of the mighty power of God:" but, it should be observed, that he operates on the minds of rational creatures according to their nature. The instantaneous renewal of a fallen angel to the divine image, would be as real a display of omnipotence as his first creation, and in some respects a greater: but the Lord might effect this renovation in a different manner. Having made use of truth, as the medium of his almighty energy, in overcoming the dark and obstinate enmity of his fallen nature, and in producing a willingness to be restored; he might afterwards require his concurrence in the use of means, through which that recovery should be effected. Now we are informed, that the Lord regenerates sinners by his word: (Jam. i. 18. 1 Pet. i. 23.) ministers, therefore, and parents, and many others in different ways, are bound to set before those committed to their care, the word of truth; and to treat them as reasonable creatures, addressing their understandings and consciences, their hopes, fears, and all the passions and powers of their souls; beseeching God "to give them repentance to the acknowledging of the truth." And all they, who are convinced that such a renewal must take place in them, or else that they must be miserable, should be induced by the consideration that they cannot change their own hearts, (that being the work of the Holy Spirit,) to seek this needful blessing, by reading the Scriptures, retirement, meditation, self-examination, hallowing the Lord's day, hearing faithful preaching and other instruction, breaking off known sin, practising known duties, avoiding vain company and dissipation, and earnestly praying to God to "create in them a clean heart, and to renew a right spirit within them." Convictions of our inability have a similar effect upon us in all other cases; and uniformly induce us to seek help from those who are able to help us with an earnestness proportioned to the supposed importance of the interest that is at stake.

As for those who continue to treat this subject with contempt and derision; it is sufficient to observe, that, seeing they will neither believe our testimony, nor that of Christ, they will at last have no cause to complain, if they are left destitute of that gracious influence which they have so despised.—Some may however believe, that such things are, who are yet at a loss to know what they are: and them I would press in the most urgent manner, to beg of God daily and earnestly, to teach them what it is to be born again; and thus in due time their own experience will terminate their perplexity.—But let those who admit the doctrine beware, lest they rest in the notion, without the experience and effects of it. And finally, let all who have known the happy change also recollect continually, that they need to be renewed more and more; (Tit. ii. 5.) and should, therefore, unite with gratitude for what the Lord hath wrought, persevering in prayer for a more complete recovery unto the divine image, in all the powers, dispositions, and affections of their souls.

ESSAY XIII.

On the Personality and Deity of the Holy Spirit: with some Thoughts on the doctrine of the Sacred Trinity.

THE Christian dispensation is distinguished by the Apostles as “the ministration of the Spirit;” (2 Cor. iii. 8.) and a careful investigation of the Scriptures must convince an impartial inquirer, that the promise of the Holy Ghost is the grand peculiarity of the New-Testament, even as that of the Messiah was of the Old. Having shown the nature and necessity of regeneration, it regularly occurs to us in this place, to give a more particular statement of the scriptural doctrine concerning the Holy Spirit. Those things which relate to the personality and Deity of the Spirit, and to the doctrine of the Trinity as connected with it, will constitute, therefore, our present subject : while his extraordinary and ordinary operations, influences, and gifts ; the office he performs in the economy of our salvation, and the duties resulting from them, must be reserved for the subsequent Essay.

When we use the term personality in the discussion of this subject, we simply mean, that language is used in Scripture concerning the Holy Spirit, and actions, are ascribed to him, which are suited to convey the idea of a personal Agent ; and such as would be extremely improper, if a mere attribute or mode of operation were intended. Yet all who deny the personality of the Holy Ghost, and pay any suitable respect to the sacred oracles in which so much is constantly ascribed to him, must hold the latter opinion. We do not however suppose, that the words person and personality can, in an adequate manner, explain to us the distinct subsistence of the Spirit ; or assist our conceptions in respect of mysteries, which we profess to consider as absolutely incomprehensible.

Indeed, the words themselves, in this use of them, are not found in Scripture : but when divine truths are opposed with ingenuity, learning, and pertinacity, it becomes necessary for those who would “ contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints,” to vary their expressions ; because their opponents will invent some plausible method of explaining away those terms which had before been made use of. That imperfection, which characterizes every thing that belongs to man, is peculiarly discernible in human language : the mysteries of the infinite God, can only be declared to us, in words primarily taken from the relations and affairs of men ; and every thing that relates to infinity confounds and overwhelms our finite and narrow capacities. The most careful and able writers cannot, on such topics, wholly prevent their readers from attaching ideas to their words, which they did not mean to convey by them : so that they, whose object it is to put an absurd construction on our expressions, or to enervate by a plausible interpretation the language of Holy Scripture, will never find it very difficult to accomplish their purpose, as far as the generality of mankind are concerned. If we speak of three distinct Persons in the Godhead, they may charge us with holding three distinct gods; supposing or pretending we mean, that this incomprehensible distinction is perfectly like the obvious distinction of three men from each other. On the other hand, the labour, study, and ingenuity of revolving centuries have so perplexed the subject, that we cannot at present find words explicitly to state our sentiments, and exactly to mark in what respects we differ from our opponents, unless we use such terms as they object to: at least this is my principal reason for adhering to them. If however our expressions convey to the reader's mind the doctrine of Scripture, with as much perspicuity and precision, as human language generally admits of; it is mere trifling to object to them, because they are not found in the Bible; for truths, not words, constitute the matter of revelation, and words are only the vehicle of truths to our minds. We are in fact deeply convinced that some men have got the habit or art of evading the force of scriptural terms; and of thus misleading others into error: and is it not allowable for us to state our sentiments in other words; and then to prove that those sentiments are actually contained in Holy Scripture? or can we do otherwise, unless we be disposed to give our opponents every possible advantage in the argument? For it cannot well be doubted by impartial persons, but that aversion to the doctrines themselves lies at the bottom of those objections, which are made to the words in which their defenders have been used to express them.

We proceed, therefore, to consider the personality of the Holy Spirit: premising, that as "these are heavenly things," (John iii. 12, 13.) we can neither explain them clearly in human language, nor illustrate them fully by earthly things, nor yet prove them by arguments from human reason. The whole rests entirely on the authority of divine revelation; we gain our knowledge of them by simply believing God's sure testimony; and we should improve them to practical purposes in humble adoration, and not treat them as subjects of disputatious speculation, or presumptuous curiosity. And may He, who hath promised to "give his Holy Spirit to those who ask him," guide us by his divine teaching into the sanctifying knowledge of the truth, in this and every subject that we investigate.

If such language be uniformly used in the Scriptures concerning the Holy Spirit, as in all other cases would convey to our minds the ideas of personality and personal agency; we may be sure that the true believer will conclude him to be a personal Agent. In allegories indeed, and in sublime poetry, we often find attributes, propensities, or modes of operation personified; but none, except the most ignorant reader, is in danger of being misled. Should any man suppose, that Wisdom, in the book of Proverbs, was introduced merely as an allegorical person; we might allow that he had some colour for his opinion: though I should rather say, that the Messiah, the Word and Wisdom of the Father, who is made wisdom to us, is the real speaker in those passages.—But if such bold figures of speech, without any intimation, are interwoven in historical or didactic discussions; or in promises and precepts, that is, grants and laws, where the greatest precision is absolutely necessary; what instruction can be certainly derived from revelation? or how shall we know what we are to believe, to do, or to expect? Surely this supposition tends directly to render the Scriptures useless; and to perplex and bewilder every serious inquirer after the way of eternal life! Yet I shall especially select my proofs of the personality of the Holy Spirit from those parts of the sacred Volume, which are of the latter description.

Our Lord thus encouraged his Apostles when about to leave them; "I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you for ever, even the Spirit of Truth." (John xiv. 16, 17.) Afterwards he added, "The Comforter which is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father shall send in my name, He shall teach you all things:" (John xiv. 26.) and the personal pronoun (εξ εως;) is used in this and several other passages, especially in those that follow. "When the Comforter is come,—even the Spirit of truth, which proceedeth from the Father, He shall testify of me." (John xv. 26.) "When He cometh,—he shall not speak of himself; but whatsoever He shall hear, that shall he speak:" " He shall glorify me; for he shall receive of mine, and shall show it unto you:" (John xvi. 7—15.) Not to insist further on the repeated use of the personal pronoun, which the ordinary rules of language appropriate, in such discourses, to a personal agent; being sent, coming, testifying, receiving, showing, teaching, hearing, and speaking, do undoubtedly imply personal agency, if any words can determinately convey that idea: and if we suppose the strongest rhetorical figures, that ever orators or poets have used, to be constantly interwoven, in the plainest instructions and promises, we must infer that the language of the Scripture is so indeterminate and unusual, that no certain conclusions can be drawn from it. This indeed seems to be the inference, that some interpreters of the Scripture are willing should be deduced from their observations: but an insinuation more dishonourable to God, and to his holy word, can hardly be imagined.

In like manner the Apostle Paul, when expressly instructing the Corinthians concerning the gifts of the Spirit, uses the strongest personal language: "All these worketh that one and self-same Spirit, dividing to every man severally as he will;" (Cor. xii. 11.) but are not working, dividing, and willing, personal acts? or can such terms be used of a mere attribute, consistently with the precision required in religious instructions?—Again, he says, "the Spirit searcheth all things; yea, the deep things of God. For what man knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of man, which is in him? Even so the things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God," (Cor. ii. 10.)

We read likewise that the Holy Spirit, dwells in us, leads us, bears witness with our Spirits, makes intercession for us; and "He that leadeth the hearts, "knoweth what is the mind of the Spirit :” but who can deny that all this implies personal agency? (Rom. viii. 11. 14. 16. 26, 27.) The sacred historian also records several instances, in which the Holy Spirit spoke, acted, and commanded. “The Holy Ghost spake by the mouth of David,” (Acts i. 16.) “The Spirit said to Philip,” (Acts viii. 29.) “The Spirit said to Peter—“Arise, get thee down,” (Acts x. 19, 20.) “The Holy Ghost said, separate me Barnabas and Saul; and they, being sent forth by the Holy Ghost, departed,” (Acts xiii. 2. 4.) “It seemed good to the Holy Ghost,” (Acts xv. 28.) “They were forbidden of the Holy Ghost.”—“The Spirit suffered them not,” (Acts xvi. 6, 7.) “Well spake the Holy Ghost by Esaias,” (Acts xxviii. 25.) To this the language of other Scriptures accords, “Wherefore as the Holy Ghost saith,” (Heb. iii. 7.) “Let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches,” (Rev. ii. 7.) That this is the frequent phraseology of Scripture is undeniable; and as the sacred oracles were given to make us wise unto salvation; so it is evident, that we are taught in them to think of the Holy Spirit, as of an agent, willing, hearing, speaking, acting, commanding, forbidding, receiving and executing a commission; and performing a part in the great work of our salvation, distinct from that of the Father by whom, or that of the Son, through whom, he is given unto men. I apprehend that they, who deny this doctrine, would feel themselves embarrassed, in familiarly using such language as this concerning the Spirit, or in speaking “according to the oracles of God,” in their discourses, treatises, or devotions; at least many of them deem it convenient to adopt a more literal, philosophical, or modern style, than that of the Scriptures; lest they should mislead some of their unestablished disciples, or give men reason to call their consistency in question.

When the personality of the Holy Spirit has been proved from the word of God; little difficulty remains in ascertaining his Deity. The powerful operation of the Holy Ghost, in our Lord’s miraculous conception, rendered it proper to call Him the Son of God, even in respect of his human nature, (Luke i. 35.) Ananias, by lying to the Holy Ghost, lied unto God, (Acts v. 3, 4.) Christians are “the temple of God, and the Spirit of God dwelleth in them;” yea, they are “an habitation of God through the Spirit,” (1 Cor. iii. 16. 17. vi. 19. 2 Cor. vi. 16. Eph. ii. 22.) Indeed the indwelling of the Holy Spirit in all believers, wheresoever dispersed, or however numerous, evidently implies the divine attribute of Omnipresence; nor could he “search all things, yea, even the deep things of God,” unless he were Omniscient. His work of regeneration, or new creation, and sanctification, requires Omnipotence to effect it; and surely all these are divine attributes, incommunicable to any creature. Yet, “if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of His,” (Rom. viii. 9—11.) and they are looked upon by the Apostle as strangely ignorant of Christianity, who do not know that Christians “are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in them.” But of this more abundant proof will be given, when we come to consider the ordinary influences of the Holy Spirit.

The very titles given Him confirm the same conclusion. He is called by way of eminence, “the Holy Spirit,” “the Spirit of Holiness,” “the Spirit of Truth,” “the Spirit of Power,” “the Spirit of Promise,” “the Spirit of Wisdom and Knowledge,” “the Comforter,” “the Eternal Spirit.” These, and several other expressions of a similar nature, seem to denote both his essential perfections, and the nature or effect of his influences on our minds; and to distinguish him from all those created spirits, which are “sent forth to minister to the heirs of salvation.” And when it is said, that “He divideth to every man severally as he will;” his divine Sovereignty, as well as his personal volition, is declared to us.

But if distinct personality, agency, and divine perfections be, in Scripture, ascribed to the FATHER, and to the SON, and to the HOLY SPIRIT; no words can more exactly express the doctrine, which must unavoidably be thence inferred, than those commonly used on this subject, viz. that 'there are three distinct Persons in the Unity of the Godhead.' The sacred oracles most assuredly teach us, that the One living, and true God is, in some inexplicable manner, Triune; for He is spoken of, as One in some respects, and as Three in others. Nor is it a matter of subordinate importance; as the dependence, confidence, affections, and worship, peculiar to Christianity, are manifestly connected by an indissoluble tye, with our sentiments in this respect; for, (not to anticipate the subject of the ensuing Essay,) how can we avoid "grieving the Spirit," if we entertain thoughts of Him infinitely beneath his divine dignity and excellency?

Men may, and probably will, persist in confidently asserting without proof, that the doctrine of the Trinity is either a contradiction in itself, or inconsistent with the Unity of the Deity; they may inform us, that the primitive Christians learned it from Plato and his followers, and so corrupted the faith by philosophy, (though it is a thousand times more likely, that Plato borrowed his ideas from those Scriptures which were extant in his time.) and they may dignify themselves with the name of Unitarians, as if none else worshipped the one true God. But we shall still have the satisfaction, (mingled with our regret at such departures from the faith,) to find that they grow proportionably shy of the phraseology of the Scriptures; that they want to diminish men's reverence for the sacred writers; that they are constrained to adopt methods of interpretation, in respect of those testimonies they still admit to be a divine revelation, which would be deemed contemptible, if employed in fixing the sense of any reputable classical writer; and that they make their principal appeal, not to the oracles of God, but to the oracles of human reason, or to the vague and disputed standard of antiquity. It must be evident to all, who are conversant with modern treatises on these subjects, that such as oppose the doctrine of the Trinity, no longer attempt to support their sentiments, by appealing to the Scriptures as the standard of truth; and particularly examining and answering the arguments we thence deduce ; at the same time allowing the Bible, as we have received it from our fathers, to be the infallible word of God ; and that it ought to be interpreted by the same rules which judicious scholars employ in explaining other ancient writers. A very small part of the Scripture is by them considered to be of divine authority ; and they would have us discard the rest as doubtful or irrational, or at most to give it a very subordinate measure of attention.

Could it be proved that Trinitarians were not Unitarians also, some ground would be gained by their opponents : but we suppose, that the Trinity of Persons in the Deity, consists with the Unity of the divine essences ; though we pretend not to explain the modus of it, and deem those reprehensible who have attempted it ; as the modus in which any being subsists, according to its distinct nature and known properties, is a secret to the most learned naturalist to this present day, and probably will always so continue. But if the most common of God's works, with which we are the most conversant, be in this respect incomprehensible ; how can men think, that the modus existendi, (or manner of existence,) of the infinite Creator can be level to their capacities ?—The doctrine of the Trinity is indeed a mystery ; but no man hath yet shown, that it involves in it a real contradiction. Many have ventured to say, that it ought to be ranked with transubstantiation, as equally absurd. But Arch-bishop Tillitson has shown, by the most convincing arguments imaginable, that transubstantiation, includes the most palpable contradictions ; and that we have the evidence of our eyes, feeling, and taste, that what we receive in the Lord's supper is bread, and not the body of a man ; whereas we have the testimony of our eyes alone that the words, " This is my body," are at all in the Scriptures.—Now this is intelligible to the meanest capacity ; it is fairly made out, and perfectly unanswerable ; but who ever attempted thus to prove the doctrine of the Trinity to be self-contradictory ? What testimony of our senses, or what demonstrated proposition does it contradict? Yet till this be shown, it is neither fair, nor convincing, to exclaim against it as contradictory, absurd, and irrational.

It is indeed very easy to say that Three and One cannot be the same; and then to show, that an absurd notion, which they falsely charge us with maintaining, is self-contradictory. But if we may not quote, (1 John v. 7, 8.) as a proof of our doctrine, that remarkable text which has been so much contested; whether it contain the genuine words of the Apostle, or be an interpolation made in after ages; we may surely use it, as expressing our sentiments; “There are Three that bear record in heaven; the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost, and these Three are One.” Three Persons, the masculine being used; one Being, or one Deity, (numen, θεῖον,) the neuter being substituted. Now let any man in logical form prove, if he can, that these words involve a real contradiction; but till this is done, let none mistake confident assertion for demonstration.

I cannot but hope, that the preceding concise arguments have fully shown, that the sacred writers spoke as strong language, concerning the Personality and Deity of the Holy Spirit, as even the Nicene Fathers themselves did; though they did not use such illustrations, explanations, distinctions, or definitions, as the latter unhappily employed in the controversy; nor do I scruple to aver that the Deity of Christ hath been fully proved in the seventh and eighth Essays. And if these two points have been established on Scriptural authority, all that can be urged against the doctrine of the Trinity on other grounds, only suggests these questions: Is the human intellect, or the infinite understanding of God, most competent to determine on the incomprehensible mysteries of the divine Nature? And shall we abide by the language of inspiration, or give it up for that of human reason? What is faith? Is it not a disposition to say, “let God be true, and every man a liar?” For “the testimony of God is sure, making wise the simple.” If the Scriptures be incontestably proved to be the word of God, by unanswerable external and internal evidences; and a man shall still presume to say, that 'to allow such a doctrine as that of the Trinity to be contained in it, is enough to impeach its divine authority;' it amounts only to this, that he is so wise in his own eyes, so leans to his own understanding, and is so fond of his own sentiments, that he is determined not to be convinced by any testimony, human or divine.

In addition to the general argument, for the doctrine in question above stated, it may be proper to consider a few remarkable passages of Scripture, in which the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost are mentioned together, or jointly addressed in the same act of worship.—When our Lord was baptized, the Father, by a voice from heaven, declared him to be his beloved Son, and publicly sealed his appointment to the mediatorial office; of which he solemnly accepted, and on which he then entered; and the Holy Spirit, descending visibly, under the emblematic representation of a dove, lighted upon him; as through him to be communicated to all his true disciples. Thus the Three Persons, in the sacred Trinity, evidently acted according to the parts sustained by them, in the great work of man's salvation.—But the appointed form of Christian baptism is far more conclusive; "Baptizing them into the name," (not names,) "of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." By baptism we declare our dependence and devotedness to Him, in whose name we are baptized; and it certainly is one of the most solemn acts of worship we can perform. Would it not then greatly tend to mislead us, if a mere creature, and an attribute or mode of operation, were joined with the One true God in this ordinance? Upon the Trinitarian system, the form is extremely proper; but that man must surely have very lax notions of the peculiar honour due to God which he will not give to another, who can think it consistent with the doctrine of our opponents.—This form of baptism fully warrants the ancient excellent doxology retained by our church. · Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost;

as it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be, world without end, Amen.' It is also worthy of our observation, that Anti-trinitarians in former times attempted to improve our Lord's words, saying, 'In the name of the Father, and through the Son, and by, or in, the Holy Ghost ;' which, joined with modern attempts to show the Scriptural form to be non-essential to baptism, constitutes a full proof, that the argument is of great force even in the opinion of our opponents.

When our Lord says, (John xvi. 13—15.) "The Spirit of Truth—shall glorify me ; for he shall receive of mine, and shall show it unto you. All things that the Father hath are mine ; therefore, said I, that he shall take of mine, and shall show it unto you ;" he evidently establishes the doctrine of the Trinity. The personality, and consequently the Deity, of the Spirit, has been proved from many testimonies : if all things belonging to the Father belong to Christ also, his Deity must be allowed ; and thus the three Persons in the sacred Trinity are here pointed out to our observation.

The apostolic benediction, (2 Cor. xiii. 14.) "The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all, Amen ;" has a plain reference to the one name into which Christians are baptized ; and it may remind us of the form of blessing appointed in the law—"Speak unto Aaron and unto his Sons, saying; On this wise shall ye bless the children of Israel, saying to them, The LORD bless thee and keep thee ; the LORD make his face shine upon thee, and be gracious to thee : The LORD lift up his countenance upon thee, and give thee peace. And they shall put my name upon the children of Israel, and I will bless them," (Numb. vi. 24—26.) The threefold repetition of the name JEHOVAH, with the concluding sentence, "they shall put my name upon the children of Israel," is very remarkable ; and the whole accords to the adorations of the heavenly worshippers, "Holy, Holy, Holy, is the Lord of hosts," (Is. vi. 3. Rev. iv. 8.) The benediction used by Paul was in reality a solemn act of worship, equally with the blessing pronounced by the priests. It was a prayer, in behalf of the Corinthians, for all the blessings of salvation ; and these he sought from the Lord Jesus, and from the Holy Spirit, as well as from God the Father.—The address of the Apostle John to the seven churches in Asia, in which he wishes, or prays for, grace and peace to them, from the eternal Father, from the seven Spirits before the throne, and from the Lord Jesus, (Rev. i. 4—6.) is precisely of the same nature, and contains a conclusive argument in proof of our doctrine. According to the emblematic style of the Revelation of John, the Holy Spirit, with reference to his manifold gifts and graces, and to the seven churches in Asia, is spoken of as the seven Spirits before the throne ; but we cannot doubt of the meaning ; nor can we imagine, that any created spirits would have been thus joined with the eternal God in such an evident act of solemn adoration.

I shall close the present Essay by again observing, that the subject before us is of the greatest importance. Either Trinitarians or Anti-trinitarians, are idolaters ; for they cannot both worship that God, who reveals himself to us in Scripture ; but one of them must substitute an imaginary being in his place. It is not, therefore, a subject to be decided by sallies of wit, ostentation of learning, or attempting to render one another odious and ridiculous. A sober, humble, teachable mind, disposed to believe the testimony of God, is above all things requisite in such inquiries : this should be sought from God by fervent prayer ; and then the Scriptures must be daily and diligently examined with an obedient and reverend mind. The writer of these remarks was once an Anti-trinitarian ; and on the point of leaving the Church of England, from objections to her doctrine and worship in this respect. But the study of the Scriptures has totally changed his judgment : and as he then neglected, or disliked, the other doctrines which he now values more than life, and was a stranger to vital experimental religion : so he cannot but perceive that they, who deny this doctrine, gradually give up other peculiarities of Christianity, till the name alone, or very little more, be left of it—He must therefore deem it, (like the key-stone of an arch,) essential to the support of evangelical piety; and would conclude these observations on the Trinity, with the Apostle's words, "This is the true God, and eternal life; little children, keep yourselves from idols. Amen."

But while we deem the rejection of this doctrine a virtual renunciation of Christian baptism, a dissent from the apostolical benediction, and a substitution of another object of worship in the place of the God of the Bible; and while we lament the rapid progress of this destructive heresy, which often proves a forerunner to prepare the way for a more avowed apostasy; we must also observe, that it is almost equally to be lamented, that so few who profess the doctrine, seem to understand its real nature and tendency, or to experience its sanctifying efficacy upon their hearts. Alas! what will it avail any man to have maintained, or even triumphantly contended for, this fundamental truth, if he continue the devotee of ambition, avarice, or any other vile affection? Of what use is it to show the distinct offices of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, in the work of our salvation; unless we, as lost sinners, depend on the everlasting love and free mercy of the Father; on the merits and mediation of the incarnate Son; and on the sanctifying grace of the Holy Spirit? No outward administration of baptism can profit those, who are not made, by "the true baptism," the spiritual worshippers and servants of "the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost." Nor can the pronouncement of the Apostle's benediction save any man, who does not partake of the blessings pronounced in the inward experience of his own soul.

Finally, whilst we disregard the charge of bigotry, in refusing all religious intercourse with Anti-trinitarians, lest we should give a sanction to their heresy, let us protest against all attempts to injure them in their temporal interests. Every kindness is due to them, as men when they need it; many of them, as good members of society, are entitled to civil respect and commendation; and by this conduct, we shall best silence the censures brought against our principles as intolerant; and prove that they enlarge the heart with the most diffusive philanthropy.

ESSAY XIV.

On the Gifts and Influences of the Holy Spirit.

THE subject, selected for the present Essay, has occasioned a variety of dangerous or destructive mistakes. While some have advanced claims in this respect, which seem at least to place them upon an equality with Prophets, Apostles, and inspired writers; others, (perceiving the absurdity or arrogance of such pretensions; deeming themselves wise, strong, or good, by their native powers and exertions; and having no experience to direct them in discriminating between what is scriptural, and what anti-scriptural,) have argued, that we neither want, nor are warranted to expect any divine or supernatural influences; that they were exclusively vouchsafed to the Apostles and primitive Christians; and that all now, spoken of the operations or assistance of the Spirit, is mere enthusiasm and delusion. These opposite extremes have also admitted of intermediate errors and variations. Some contend, that there is no discoverable distinction between divine influences and the actings of our own minds; and do not clearly admit of an exception, even as to the diverse effects produced by these distinct causes: others suppose that they are immediately distinguishable by an inward and a kind of instinctive consciousness, (like that which assured the Prophets that they were divinely inspired;) and thus, whilst they seem to honour the Spirit, and will attempt nothing till, as they say, they are moved by him, they covertly advance a claim to infallibility and perfection in those favoured seasons, or impute all their mistakes and follies to this sacred Agent.—Nor is it uncommon for men to plead that they are influenced by the Holy Spirit, in order to establish other rules of faith and practice than the written word of God; to bring that, or some parts of it, into a measure of discredit; or even to substitute something wrought in them or by them, in the place of the righteousness and atoning blood of the Saviour, whom the Spirit is sent to glorify among men.—In short, much enthusiasm and spiritual pride, and many fatal or disgraceful delusions have, on the one hand, arisen from misapprehensions of this subject; and, on the other, multitudes have taken occasion from these incidental evils, to treat the whole with profane contempt and derision.

But a careful attention to the Scriptures, and to the ends for which the Holy Spirit was promised, may enable us properly to discriminate in this matter; and to show in what sense, and for what purposes, we ought to expect and depend on the influences of the Spirit; and which of his gifts and operations were peculiar to the primitive times, or to extraordinary occasions. I shall, therefore, at present offer some thoughts on the miraculous gifts and powers, imparted by the Holy Ghost;—on those ordinary endowments, which uninspired men may reasonably expect to receive from him:—on his common influences upon the minds of many unconverted persons;—and on the special nature of that sanctifying work, by which “the vessels of mercy are afore prepared unto glory.” (Rom. ix. 24.)

If we accurately mark the language of the Scriptures, we shall find that the Holy Spirit is spoken of, as the Author and Giver of all those miraculous and supernatural powers, with which any of the human race were ever endowed.—Not only did “holy men of God speak as they were moved by the holy Ghost;” (2 Pe. i. 21.) not only did Apostles, Evangelists, and primitive believers receive the Holy Ghost, enabling them to cast out devils, heal the sick, raise the dead, speak in languages before unknown, or interpret the discourses of others : but even Christ himself was “ anointed by the Holy Ghost,” to work his beneficent miracles. (Acts x. 38.) He cast out devils “ by the Spirit of God ;” (Matt. xii. 28.) “ who was not given to Him by measure :” (John iii. 34.) and “ through the Holy Ghost he gave commandments to His Apostles.” (Acts i. 2.) Indeed, the promises made to him in the Old Testament especially relate to this ; and his very title of the Messiah, the Christ, the Anointed of the Lord, was derived from it. (Psa. xlv. 7. Is. xi. 2, 3. xlii. 1. lix. 21. lxi. 1.) Now we cannot satisfactorily account for these expressions ; or reconcile them with our Lord’s conduct, in speaking and acting as in his own name, or by his own authority and power ; unless we advert to the distinction between his divine and human nature, and his personal and mediatorial dignity ; and remember, that, in respect to his divine nature, he is One with the Father, and with the Holy Spirit, in all the essence, perfections, and operations of the Godhead. We must therefore consider the Holy Spirit as the great Agent, according to the economy of the everlasting covenant in the inspiration of the Scriptures ; in the performance of all these miracles, by which the messengers of God authenticated their doctrine ; and in the revelation of those future events, which, being interwoven with every part of the sacred volume, and receiving their accomplishment from age to age, confirm the divine original of the whole to every attentive and impartial inquirer.

Such discoveries of the truth and will of God had been made from the beginning ; but they became more particular and copious, when Israel was brought out of Egypt, and the law was given by Moses. The Prophets and other servants of God, who from time to time were raised up to call the attention of Israel to his law and promises, or to effect extraordinary deliverances for the nation, were endued with miraculous powers by the same Spirit. At the coming of Christ, Mary, Elizabeth, Zacharias, Simeon, and Anna, spake of Him by the Spirit ; and his Apostles and seventy disciples partook of these extraordinary gifts and miraculous powers, even before our Lord's crucifixion. Yet the out-pouring of the Spirit, at and after the day of Pentecost, was so vastly superior, in energy, extent, and duration, that John, who had witnessed and experienced both, says, in recording the discourses of Christ, "This he spake of the Spirit—for the Holy Ghost was not yet given, because that Jesus was not yet glorified:" (John vii. 29.) Whatever had preceded that great event, was an earnest of the dispensation of the Spirit; yet it did not belong to it, nor was worthy to be compared with it. But when Jesus was risen and ascended on high, these gifts were showered down on men in rich abundance, to confirm the testimony of the Apostles to his resurrection, and to qualify them and their fellow-workers to spread the gospel through the nations: and being communicated by the laying on of the Apostle's hands, the number of witnesses and instruments was continually multiplied, and provision was made for the rapid spread of their salutary doctrine.

The evident design and use of these extraordinary operations of the Spirit was, to rouse the attention of a careless world to the spiritual doctrines of the Gospel; to counterbalance men's prejudices in favour of their old traditions, and against religious innovations; and to put honour on those, who were commissioned to propagate Christianity in the midst of contempt and persecution. (Mat. xxviii. 18—20. Mark xvi. 15—18. Luke xxiv. 46—49.) The gift of tongues, especially seems to have been indispensably necessary, to enable the first preachers of the gospel to address men of different nations in a suitable manner: and the difficulty of learning the languages of heathen nations, forms, at this day, one grand impediment to the promulgation of our holy religion. These powers seem to have continued with the Church, in some measure, during the three first centuries, or perhaps rather longer; but to have decreased in proportion as Christianity obtained establishment in the world. At length, when "the only wise God our Saviour" saw, that occasional prejudices had sufficiently subsided, and extraordinary obstacles were in a great degree removed; and that the truth had only to contend with those lusts of man's fallen nature, and those efforts of the powers of darkness, which are common to every age and place; he was pleased to withdraw these extraordinary gifts and operations, and to carry on his work, by means of the written word, the fulfilment of prophecies, and other abiding evidences of the truth, and the ordinary influences of the Holy Spirit.—But He hath not expressly declared that he will on no future occasion endue his servants with miraculous powers, or confer on them the Spirit of prophecy. We may, however, be assured that such powers will never be imparted, to enable men to support any thing materially different from that complete revelation which we now possess: and for thirteen hundred years at least, all pretences to miracles or prophecy, have, in one way or other, tended to subvert the doctrine contained in the New Testament; and have justly been deemed impostures, or satanical delusions, and marks of Antichrist. In this respect, therefore, the promise of the Spirit exclusively related to the primitive times; or at least, all pretensions at present to new revelations, predictions, miracles, or infallibility, are enthusiastic, arrogant, and unwarranted.

The Scriptures are fully authenticated as a complete rule of faith and practice; Christianity has all the advantages which it can possess in a world that "lieth in the wicked one;" there is no rival system, pretending to be a divine revelation, that can at all stand in competition with it; ministers may obtain needful qualifications, by the ordinary blessing of God on their diligent studies; the establishment, which our religion has had for so many ages, and through so many nations, gives it a sort of claim by prescription to the attention of mankind; and the Lord sees these things to be sufficient for the accomplishment of his purposes, in the present state of human affairs.

tical powers, imparted by the Holy Spirit, had no inseparable connexion with personal sanctity; and have often been bestowed on very wicked men. Balaam, who “loved the wages of unrighteousness,” and perished among the enemies of God, might nevertheless have said with David, “the Spirit of the Lord spake by me, and his word was in my tongue.” (Numb. xxiii. 5. 16. xxiv. 2. 16—24. 2 Sam. xxiii. 2.) Judas was doubtless endued with the power of casting out devils, and working miracles, as well as the other Apostles; and Christ hath assured us, that “Many will say unto him in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name, and in thy name have cast out devils, and in thy name done many wonderful works: and then will he profess unto them, I never knew you, Depart from me, ye that work iniquity.” (Matt. vii. 22, 23. 1 Cor. xiii. 1—3.) These gifts were also liable to be abused by man’s ambition and corrupt passions; and, however useful to others, were injurious, or even fatal, to the possessor, if he were not disposed and enabled by the sanctifying influences of the Holy Spirit, to use them in humility, zeal, and love. (1 Cor. xii. xiv.)

But there are also other gifts, derived from the same Spirit, which are not directly of a sanctifying nature. It is observable that John the Baptist, who was “filled with the Holy Ghost from his mother’s womb,” wrought no miracles: yet our Lord declared that “he was more than a prophet;” and it is evident, that he was more illuminated in the nature of Christ’s redemption and kingdom, than any of the Apostles were, previously to the descent of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost. His divine illumination, therefore, according to the Scriptures of the prophets, and his ministerial endowments, though not miraculous, were the gifts of the Holy Ghost.

The Apostles and disciples, on the day of Pentecost, were not only endued with miraculous powers, but greatly advanced in their knowledge of the gospel, delivered from their prejudices and mistakes, raised above the fear of men, and enabled to speak with promptitude, facility, and propriety, far beyond what was natural to them, or what they could have acquired by habit or study. That wonderful change, which in these respects took place in them, ought to be ascribed entirely to the agency of the promised Spirit; (John xiv. 26. xvi. 12, 13.) and we may hence conclude, that religious knowledge, prudence, fortitude, utterance, and other endowments for the sacred ministry, or for any useful service in the church, are gifts of the Holy Spirit. Diligence, indeed, in the use of proper means, is man's duty: yet the diligence itself, and much more the success of it, should be acknowledged as the gift of the Spirit of Christ. On him we ought entirely to depend for all needful qualifications for the services allotted us: and whilst we take to ourselves the blame of every mistake, defect, and evil, that mixes with our endeavours; the whole glory of all that is true, wise, or useful, should be ascribed to this divine Agent.—Surely this may be done without enthusiasm or arrogance! yea, the Apostle hath taught us to do it in his discourse on spiritual gifts; while he enumerates wisdom, knowledge, and the faculty of speaking to edification, exhortation, and comfort, among the operations of the Spirit; and these are evidently as much wanted at present, as they were in the primitive times: (1 Cor. xii. 7—11. xiv. 3.) Need we then wonder, that the official ministration of numbers at present is so devoid of pathos, energy, and scriptural wisdom; when we learn, that all dependence on the Holy Spirit in preparing for the ministry or the pulpit, is disclaimed as enthusiasm and folly? For if “no man can say that Jesus is the Lord,” or do any thing effectual to promote the gospel, “but by the Holy Ghost;” and if men, pretending to be teachers, affront this divine Agent, by rejecting and vilifying his proffered assistance, the consequence must be, that they will be left to deny or disgrace the doctrine of the gospel, instead of faithfully preaching it, and living under its sacred influence. Yet these gifts also may be possessed and exercised by those who are strangers to the sanctifying work of the Holy Spirit. Men may be enabled by the Spirit to attain knowledge in the mysteries of the gospel, and readiness in speaking or writing about them, whilst they remain ungodly; even as others have possessed miraculous or prophetic gifts, whilst they continued the slaves of avarice or lust. Thus persons often are raised up, and endowed with eminent talents, whose preaching may excite great attention and even occasionally do much good; or whose writings illuminate the church, and exceedingly tend to elucidate the truth, and to silence the objections of its enemies, and yet these very men are themselves cast-aways; "because they received not the love of the truth," neither obeyed it, but "obeyed unrighteousness." Yet these spiritual gifts are as needful at present as in old times: unless it can be believed, that men are now so wise and good, and that Christianity is so congenial to our nature, and so fully understood and practised, that we are fully competent, without any divine assistance, to maintain the cause of it in the world.

It has likewise been generally allowed by orthodox divines, that there are other influences of the Spirit on the mind, which do not always terminate in sanctification. To "resist the Holy Ghost," seems to mean something more than merely to reject the word of inspiration: and to "quench the Spirit," is not exclusively the sin of believers, when, on some occasions, they stifle his holy suggestions. He strives with, and powerfully stirs up the minds of many who are not born again; new principles are not implanted, but natural powers are excited; conscience is influenced in part to perform its office, notwithstanding the opposition of the carnal heart; and convincing views are given of many important truths. The Spirit concurs with an address to one man's fear, and even a Felix trembles before a prisoner in chains: another's hopes are addressed, and "he hears gladly, and does many things," though he will not divorce Herodias: or convincing arguments are applied with energy to an intelligent worldling, and he "is almost persuaded to be a Christian." Such characters often take up a profession of the gospel, and continue for a time, or even persist to the end, in an unfruitful form of godliness: and men of this description, who have been eminent for their talents, when the Spirit has finally ceased to strive with them, have been the principal heresiarchs in every age; while the bulk of heretical societies have been constituted of inferior persons of the same stamp. Yet as far as truth produces its proper effect, though it be at length borne down by human depravity and temptation, it ought to be ascribed to the Spirit; and in this sense, as well as in respect of miraculous powers, men have been partakers of the Holy Ghost, and have yet fallen away beyond the possibility of being renewed unto repentance. (Heb. vi. 4—6. x. 29.) On the other hand, however, these strivings are often preparatory to those “things which accompany salvation;” nor can we always exactly distinguish between them, except by the effect: for they resemble two small seeds, which are so much alike, though of distinct species, that our defective organs of sight cannot discern any difference; till having been sown, they spring up and produce their respective plants, and then they are easily and perfectly known from each other.

The observations made on Regeneration, (Essay xii.) must be referred to, as introducing what I shall here add in respect to the sanctifying work of the Holy Spirit in the hearts of believers. We may, therefore, observe, that the conversion of three thousand persons on the day of Pentecost, the rapid spread of the gospel which followed, and the holiness and joy of the primitive Christians, were as much the effect of that “out-pouring of the Spirit,” as the miraculous gifts conferred on the Apostles; and the same change, at any time wrought in men’s characters and conduct by the gospel, must uniformly be ascribed to the same cause.

But we shall be able to mark more precisely the nature of these sanctifying influences of the Spirit, by adverting to the language of Scripture on that subject.—The word

COMFORTER, by which our Lord distinguishes this divine agent, may also signify an advocate, or an admonisher; and this title implies, that it is the office of the Holy Spirit to plead the cause of God in our hearts, to excite and animate us to all holy duties, and to communicate to us all holy consolations. Water, which purifies, refreshes, and fructifies all nature; and fire, which illuminates, penetrates, melts, softens, and consumes whatever cannot be, as it were, changed into its own likeness, are the emblems of that Spirit with which Christ baptizes his true disciples.—“When he is come,” “he will reprove,” or convince—“of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment.” This divine light so discovers to men their obligations to God, and the demands of his perfect law, that they are deeply convicted of guilt, even in such things as before did not burden their consciences; especially they soon perceive their state of condemnation as unbelievers, and the atrocious evil of not receiving Christ by faith. They are thus convinced of the justice of God in his dealings with sinners, and understand his righteousness in justifying believers; and so are brought to realize habitually a judgment to come, as the whole tenor of revelation manifests to them, that the prince of this world and all his subjects lie under certain condemnation. These convictions render the conscience ever after proportionally tender and susceptible, and the heart penitent, contrite, and watchful against all occasions and appearances of evil, disposed to resist temptation, and strive against sin as the object of dread and abhorrence; to love purity, and to long for holiness; and to form the temper patient, meek, forgiving, and compassionate to the vilest and most prosperous of ungodly men.

When the Holy Spirit has thus prepared the hearts of sinners, (as he did those of the Jews on the day of Pentecost, (Acts ii. 37.)) “He glorifies Christ, for he receives of the things of Christ, and shows them unto them,” (John xvi. 7—15.) By his illuminating energy, by divesting the mind of proud and carnal prejudices, and by bringing the truths of Scripture to their remembrance, He discovers to them the glory and excellence of Emmanuel's Person, his infinite compassion and condescension, the perfection of his righteousness, the preciousness of his blood, the prevalence of his intercession, and the suitableness of his whole salvation. In proportion, therefore, as the sinner is abased and humbled in his own eyes, and is made to abhor all sin, Christ becomes precious in his estimation ; the Comforter exalts the Saviour in his heart ; he perceives Him to be " altogether lovely," " the Pearl of great price," and that all things are but loss in comparison of Him. Now he begins to discern something of his unsearchable riches, his unfathomed love, his inexhaustible fulness ; he finds that all he can want is comprized in a relation to Christ, and an interest in him, and in union and communion with him. His liberty, honour, pleasure, and felicity consist in having such a Saviour, Brother, and Friend ; and those strains of admiring love, desire, gratitude, and praise, which once appeared to him too rapturous, or even enthusiastic, become the genuine language of his most lively hours. At the same time he knows that they are all far beneath his real excellency and glory ; and thus the love of Christ to him, and his reciprocal love to Christ, constrain him to live to his glory, to copy his example, and obey his precepts.—Here again we may very properly observe, that in proportion as the doctrine of the Spirit is exploded, or overlooked, the Person and work of Christ are generally dishonoured ; and whilst men plume themselves on rational religion, they evidence, and must frequently be conscious, that the language of Scripture does not suit their views, but far better accords to those of the enthusiasts, whom they so liberally vilify and cordially despise. Is it not then evident, that the reason, why Christ is no more glorified in the visible church, is simply this ; men do not expect, depend on, or seek for, the influences of the Holy Spirit in this respect ; and for that reason are left to exalt themselves, on philosophy, or some favourite author, and to degrade the Light of the World and the Life of men ?

Several prayers of Paul for his converts had respect, not to miraculous gifts, but to such things as are equally needful in every age. He "desired that the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory, might give unto them the Spirit of wisdom and revelation, in the knowledge of Him; the eyes of their understanding being enlightened, that they might know what is the hope of his calling; and what the riches of his inheritance in the saints; and what is the exceeding greatness of his power towards them that believe;" that "they might be strengthened with might by his Spirit in the inner man, that Christ might dwell in their hearts by faith; that being rooted and grounded in love, they might—know the love of Christ which passeth knowledge;" that they might be filled "with the knowledge of the Lord's will, in all wisdom and spiritual understanding; that they might walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing, being fruitful in every good work, and increasing in the knowledge of God; strengthened with all might according to his glorious power, unto all patience and long-suffering with joyfulness," (Eph. i. 17—19. iii. 16—21. 1 Cor. ii. 12. 2 Cor. iv. 3—6. Col. 1. 9—22.) Now is it not necessary, that all Christians should thus know God, understand the gospel and its privileges, and be inwardly strengthened in love and obedience to the Lord Jesus? Surely these are essentials to real Christianity in every age; and the state of the professing church of Christ, amidst all modern improvements, shows that they can no more be produced without the influences of the Spirit, than skill in agriculture can ensure a crop of corn, without the influences of the sun and rain.—The Apostle says, that "the love of God is shed abroad in the heart by the Holy Ghost, who is given unto us;" and whether we understand this of our knowledge of God's love to us, or of our exercise of love to him; it is manifest, that we cannot attain to it, except by the influences of the Spirit, preparing and pervading all the faculties of our souls, (Rom. v. 5.) Indeed, all fervent affections towards God, or joy in him, are commonly deemed enthusiasm, by those who deny these doctrines ; and a decent conduct, with a form of godliness, constitutes the sum total of improved Christianity.

The same Apostle prays that the Romans “may abound in hope through the power of the Holy Ghost,” (Rom. xv. 13.) Hope is one of those graces, which abides in the church, (1 Cor. xiii. 13.) and if this springs from, and abounds through, the power of the Spirit, we must conclude, that all who are destitute of his influences, are either “without hope,” or buoyed up in presumptuous confidence. According to Peter, the believer’s obedience results from “the sanctification of the Spirit ;” and he says, “Seeing ye have purified your souls, in obeying the truth through the Spirit, unto unfeigned love of the brethren,” (1 Pet. i. 2. 22.) Surely these are duties of Christianity peculiar to no age or place ! and the assistance of the Spirit must be as needful to the performance of them at present, as when inspired Apostles were the teachers of the church. “The kingdom of God is—in righteousness, “peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost,” (Rom. xiv. 17.) how then can we rejoice in the Lord always without his blessed influences ?

But this subject is most copiously discussed in the eighth of Romans, which brevity forbids me to enlarge upon. Let it suffice in general to observe, that the Apostle ascribes the believer’s “deliverance from the law of sin and death,” to “the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus,” (2 Cor. iii. 17, 18.) and derives the “spiritual mind, which is life and peace,” from the same source. They, in whom the “Spirit of God dwells,” are “not in the flesh, but in the Spirit ;” but “if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his.” They, who “through the Spirit mortify the deeds of the body, shall live ;” they “that are led,” or willingly guided and influenced by the Spirit, “are the children of God.” He dwells in them, not as a “Spirit of bondage,” to induce them to obey God from servile motives ; but “as a Spirit of adoption, by whom they cry, Abba, Father ;” and thus producing all filial dispositions and affections in their hearts, “he witnesses with their spirits, that they are the children and heirs of God." They have, therefore, "the first fruits of the Spirit;" called also the "seal of the Spirit," being the renewal of the divine image on their souls; and the "earnest of the Spirit," or the beginning and sure pledge of heavenly felicity, (2 Cor. i. 22. Eph. i. 13, 14. iv. 30.) But who can deny that these things are essential to genuine Christianity, at all times, and in all places?

Finally, we are directed "to pray in" or by "the Holy Ghost," who "also helpeth our infirmities;" and whatever words we use, his influences alone can render our worship spiritual. Our holy tempers, affections, and actions, are called "the fruits of the Spirit," (Gal. v. 22, 23. Eph. v. 9.) to distinguish them from mere moral conduct, on worldly or legal principles. We are said, to "live in the Spirit," and "to walk in the Spirit," and to "be filled with the Spirit;" and all our heavenly wisdom, knowledge, strength, holiness, joy; all things relative to our repentance, faith, hope, love, worship, obedience, meetness for heaven, and foretastes of it, are constantly ascribed to his influences; nor can we escape fatal delusions, resist temptations, overcome the world, or glorify God; except as we are taught, sanctified, strengthened, and comforted by the Holy Spirit, who dwells in all believers "as a well of water springing up unto everlasting life."

We need not then wonder at the low ebb to which vital Christianity is fallen; when we consider how many nominal Christians utterly disclaim all dependence on the Spirit as enthusiasm; and how greatly this part of the gospel is overlooked by numbers, who are zealous for other doctrines of it! The subject, therefore, suggests to us the vast importance of owning the divine Person and whole work of the Spirit, in all our services; of praying for, that we may pray by the Spirit, (Luke xi. 13.) of applying to and depending on him in all things; of cautiously distinguishing his genuine influences from every counterfeit, by Scriptural rules; of avoiding those worldly cares, and that indolence which "quench," and all those evil tempers which "grieve the Spirit of God;" and of giving the glory of all the good wrought in, or by us, to him as its original source and author. Thus, depending on the mercy of the Father, the Atonement of the Son, and the Grace of the Spirit, we shall be prepared to give glory to the Triune God and Saviour, both now and for evermore.

ESSAY XV.

On the Uses of the Moral Law, in subserviency to the Gospel of Christ.

WHEN we have duly considered our situation as fallen creatures, and those things that relate to our recovery by the mercy of the Father, the redemption and mediation of the Son, and the sanctification of the Holy Spirit; we must be convinced that “we are saved by grace, through faith; and that not of ourselves, it is the gift of God; not of works, lest any man should boast;” (Eph. ii. 3—10.) and under this conviction it is natural for us to inquire, “wherefore then serveth the law?” (Gal. iii. 19.) The Apostle indeed introduces this question, as the objection of a Judaizing teacher to the doctrines of grace; but in the present endeavour to state the uses of the law as subservient to the gospel, it is necessary to premise, that neither the ritual law, nor the legal dispensation, is meant; the former typified, and the latter introduced, the clear revelation of the gospel; and they were both superseded and antiquated by the coming of Christ. The moral law alone is intended, which was originally written in the heart of man, as created in the image of God; was afterwards delivered with awful solemnity from Mount Sinai, in ten commandments; is elsewhere summed up, in the two great commandments of loving God with all our hearts, and our neighbour as ourselves; and is explained and enlarged upon in a great variety of particular precepts, throughout the whole Scripture. This law, besides what it more directly enjoins, implicitly requires us to love, admire, and adore every discovery that God shall please at any time to make to us of his glorious perfections ; cordially to believe every truth he shall reveal and authenticate ; and willingly to obey every positive appointment which he shall at any time be pleased to institute, (Essay iv.)

This law is immutable in its own nature ; for it could not be abrogated, or altered, without an apparent intimation that God was not so glorious, lovely, and excellent ; or so worthy of all possible honour, admiration, gratitude, credit, adoration, submission, and obedience, as the law had represented him to be ; or without seeming to allow, that man had at length ceased to be under those obligations to God, or to stand in those relations to him and to his neighbour, from which the requirements of the law at first resulted. The moral law, I say, could not be changed, in any essential point ; unless we could cease to be under infinite obligations to our great Creator ; unless He could allow us in some degree to be alienated from him, and despisers of him ; or to love worldly objects, and our own temporal advantage or pleasure, more than his infinite excellency, and to prefer them to his glory, and the enjoyment of his favour ; unless he could allow us to be ungrateful for his benefits, to discredit his veracity, to dispute his authority, to reject the appointment of his wisdom, and to injure, neglect, corrupt, or hate one another, to the confusion and ruin of his fair creation. Such absurd and dreadful consequences may unanswerably be deduced, from the supposition of the moral law of God being repealed or altered ; and they are the bane of all Antinomianism, and of every system formed on the absurd notion of a new and milder law promulgated by Jesus Christ, however ingeniously it may be arranged, or however such schemes may be diversified. The Lord may, consistently with the immutable perfections of his nature, and the righteousness of his government, reveal truths before unknown ; he may abrogate positive institutions, or appoint others ; he may arrange various circumstances relative to the law in a new manner, according to the different situations in which rational agents are placed ; but the love of God with all the powers of the soul, and the equal love of each other, must continue the indispensable duty of all reasonable creatures, however circumstanced, through all the ages of eternity.

This law is the foundation of the covenant of works ; and it is the wisdom of every holy creature in a state of probation to seek justification by obeying it : but for fallen men who are continually transgressing, to waste their labour in vainly attempting to justify themselves before God by their own obedience, is absurd and arrogant in the greatest conceivable degree. This attempt is generally called self-righteousness ; and all the preachers of Christianity are bound most decidedly to warn men against it, as a fatal rock on which multitudes are continually perishing.

But what purposes then does the moral law answer, under a dispensation of mercy, and in subserviency to the doctrines and the covenant of grace ? And what use should the ministers of the New Testament make of it ? The following statement may perhaps contain a sufficient reply to these questions ; and likewise make way for some observations on the bad effects which follow from ignorance, inattention, or confused apprehensions respecting the moral law, in the ministers and professors of the gospel.

I. The Apostle says, “ I, through the law, am dead to the law, that I might live unto God ;” (Gal. ii. 19.) He doubtless meant, by being dead to the law, that he had entirely given up all hope and every thought of justification by the law, or of obtaining eternal life as the reward of his own obedience : and, having fled to Christ for justification, he was also delivered from fear of final condemnation by it. He had therefore no more to hope or fear from the law, than a man after his death hath to hope or fear from his friends or enemies. When he was a proud Pharisee, “ he was alive without the law ; but when the commandment came, sin revived, and he died:" Every impartial reader must see, that the Apostle in this remarkable passage spoke exclusively of the moral law, which he declared to be holy, just, good, and spiritual; to which he "consented that it was good," even while he failed of answering its strict demand; in which he "delighted after the inward man;" which he "served with his mind," (Rom. vii. 7—25.) or with the decided preference of his judgment, and the habitual purpose of his heart. When the sinner understands the extensive and spiritual demands and awful denunciations of the divine law, his hope of being justified according to it must expire: for he perceives that it requires a perfectly holy heart, and a perfectly holy life; that it respects every imagination, intention, affection, disposition, motive, word, and work; that it demands absolute, uninterrupted, and perfect obedience, from the first dawn of reason to the moment of death; and that it denounces an awful curse on "every one who continueth not in all things, written in its precepts, to do them." But, unless the goodness or excellency of the law be also discerned, he will not be brought to genuine self-abasement. A man may be clearly convicted of high treason, according to the letter of the statute: but if he think the statute itself iniquitous, he will persist in justifying his conduct; and his sullen enmity to the prince, the government, and his judges, will probably increase in proportion, as he sees the execution of the sentence denounced against him to be inevitable.— If men only consider the strictness of the precept, and the severity of the sanction, of the divine law, hard thoughts of God will be excited; they will deem themselves justified in desponding inactivity, or they will take refuge in antinomianism or infidelity. But when every precept is undeniably shown to be "holy, just, and good," requiring nothing but what is reasonable, equitable, and beneficial: the views and convictions thus excited strike at the root of man's self-admiration; the sinner is constrained by them to take part with God against himself, and can no longer withhold his approbation from the law, even whilst he knows himself liable to be condemned by it. For the more clearly the excellency of the precept is perceived, the more evidently do the odiousness, unreasonableness, and desert of sin, appear.

The law should therefore be very fully stated, explained, and applied to the consciences of men, for these purposes; for this constitutes the grand means, which the Lord blesses, to show sinners, in what the divine image consisted, after which Adam was at first created;—and what they ought to have been, and to have done, during the whole of their past lives;—and to convince them, that their sins have been exceedingly numerous and heinous, in thought, word, and deed, by ‘leaving undone what they ought to have done, and doing what they ought not to have done:’—that their present dispositions, and supposed duties, are vile and unworthy of God’s acceptance, yea, deserving of his wrath and abhorrence;—and, in short, that their case is hopeless and helpless, if they be left to themselves under the old covenant, and dealt with according to the merit and demerit of their works. In this way the pride of men’s hearts is abased, their mouths are stopped, their false and legal confidence is destroyed, and they are prepared by the knowledge of their sins, and by deep humiliation before God, to understand and welcome the salvation of the gospel. Thus the law was delivered from Mount Sinai, to prepare the minds of the Israelites for the promises and types of good things to come: and it should be delivered from every pulpit with most awful solemnity, in connexion with the blessed gospel; and in this way of instruction it still proves “a schoolmaster to bring us to Christ, that we may be justified by faith.”

II. The law is exceedingly useful to illustrate the necessity, nature, and glory of redemption. “The Lord is rich in mercy,” yea, “he delighteth in mercy:” why, then, does he not pardon all sinners by a mere act of sovereign grace? What need was there of a Surety, a Redeemer, or an atonement? Why must God be manifest in the flesh?

Why must Emmanuel agonize and die on the cross? Did ever earthly prince require his beloved, his only, his dutiful son, to endure the most intense tortures, previously to his pardoning any number of criminals? This could not be necessary, in order to prevail with God to love and save us: for it is every where spoken of in Scripture, as the most emphatical evidence, and richest fruit of his love to us. But the Lord is infinitely holy in his nature, and righteous in his moral government; and he is determined to “magnify his law, and make it honourable.” We had by our sins despised and dishonoured the holy law, and rendered ourselves obnoxious to the just vengeance of our Creator: if then he spared us, his holiness, justice, and law, would be disgraced, or at least the glory of them obscured; unless some other decisive method were taken of magnifying his law, displaying his justice, and filling the world with awful astonishment at his holy hatred of sin. Whilst he therefore makes these things known, by the final misery of some transgressors, he pardons others, to the praise of his glorious grace; but in such a way, as still more effectually secures the honour of his law and government. “He hath set forth his own Son to be a propitiation for sin; that He might be just, and the justifier of him that believeth.” They who really believe and understand the scriptural account of this surprising transaction, discern in a measure the necessity of this redemption, with somewhat of its real nature, and of the glory of God peculiarly displayed in it; while, to all others, the “preaching of the cross is foolishness;” and in exact proportion to our views of the excellency of the holy law, will be our admiration of the divine perfection as harmoniously glorified in the gospel.

III. The law is useful, as a rule of conduct to believers. When we have fled for refuge to Christ by faith, we are delivered from the curse of the law, and from the legal covenant; but we remain subjects of God’s moral government, and are bound to obedience by new and most endearing obligations. “Shall we then sin, because we are not under the law, but under grace? God forbid." Yet there is no other rule of duty and sin, but the moral law as above defined, and "where no law is, there is no transgression!" Our blessed Lord, when about to expound, in the most strict and spiritual manner, several precepts of the moral law, solemnly premised these words, "Whosoever therefore shall break one of these least commandments and teach men so, he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven: but whosoever shall do and teach them, the same shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven;" that is, among the ministers of his gospel. (Matt. v. 19, 20.) He says to his disciples, "If ye love me, keep my commandments;" and what are his commandments, but the precepts of the moral law enforced on believers by the most powerful and endearing obligations and motives? (John xiv. 15. 21—23. xv. 10—14.) The Apostles continually refer believers to the moral law, as the rule of their conduct; and sometimes quote for this purpose the very words of the ten commandments, (Rom. xiii. 8—10. Gal. v. 13, 14. Eph. vi. 2. Jam. ii. 8—13. iv. 11, 12. 1 John iii. 4.) "We are not without law to God, but under the law to Christ;" (1 Cor. ix. 21.) the believer receives the law, deprived of its condemning power, from the hand of the Redeemer, as the rule by which to regulate his tempers, affections, conduct and conversation, to the honour of the gospel, and the glory of God. "Do we then make void the law through faith? God forbid, yea, we establish the law." He who truly loves the divine Saviour, and feels the influence of evangelical principles, will greatly desire to know what his Lord would have him to do, that "his love may abound in knowledge, and in all judgment," (Phil. i. 9.) and that he may "not be unwise, but understanding what the will of the Lord is," (Eph. v. 17.) As there can be no authorized standard and rule of the Lord's will, except his commandments; so that Christian who best understands them will be most completely furnished for every good work; provided his knowledge of the truths and promises of Scripture be equally clear and comprehensive. And though love be both the principle of obedience, and the substance of the law; yet we need more particular directions in expressing our love, and regulating our conduct towards God and man.

IV. The law is very useful to believers, as the test or touchstone of their sincerity. It is written in the heart of all true Christians by the Holy Spirit, (Jer. xxxi. 33. Heb. viii. 10.) so that they all “delight in it after the inward man,” “consent to it that it is good,” “count all God’s commandments in all things to be right,” “love and choose all his precepts,” repent of, and mourn for, every sin as a transgression of the law, are grieved and burdened because they “cannot do the things that they would,” and long to love God and man as perfectly as the law requires. The fruits of the Spirit, by which their deliverance from the law as a covenant is sealed, are coincident with the requirements of its holy precepts; the example of Christ, which they are called and inclined to imitate, consisted in a perfect obedience to the holy law; the holiness, which they follow after is no other than conformity to it, as resulting from evangelical principles, and a constant regard to the Redeemer’s person and their obligations to him; nay, the heavenly felicity to which they aspire, is the perfection of this conformity; the full enjoyment of God, as the supreme object of their love; and the delight of sharing the happiness of all holy creatures, by loving, and being loved by them, without envy, suspicion, fear, or the alloy of any other base and selfish passion. But “the carnal mind,” (whether in an infidel, a careless sinner, a pharisee, or a hypocrite,) “is enmity against God; for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be.” All unregenerate men secretly dislike the strictness and spirituality of the law, and wish to have it abrogated or mitigated: this secret inclination is the source of all antinomian principles; and in this respect persons of the most opposite sentiments resemble each other; for virulent opposers and loose abusers of the doctrines of grace, are alike influenced both by the pride of self-confidence which is the essence of pharisaism, and by the enmity to the law which distinguishes the antinomian. On the other hand, the true believer approves of the very precept that condemns his own conduct, and longs to have his own heart changed into conformity to the holy commandment. If then professors of the gospel were more fully acquainted with the requirements of the divine law, they would be far less exposed to the danger of deceiving themselves; and sincere believers would more clearly perceive, that their mourning for sin and hatred of it, their tenderness of conscience, and uneasy longings after higher degrees of holiness than any of which they once had the least conception, constitute a "witness in themselves" of their actual union with Christ, and of their interest in all the blessings of the new covenant. At the same time a more distinct view of the justice of that awful sentence, from which Christ hath redeemed them with his own blood, would, in proportion to their assurance of deliverance and hope of eternal life, animate them to live more entirely devoted to his service, "who died for them and rose again," (2 Cor. v. 14, 15.)

V. The knowledge of the law is exceedingly useful to believers, as a standard of continual self-examination, to exclude spiritual pride, and to keep the soul at all times abased, and simply dependent on the Lord Jesus Christ. Knowledge, gifts, usefulness, or other attainments by which men are distinguished from those around them, have a powerful tendency to excite self-complacency and self-preference: but when a believer comes to compare the state of his heart, and the very duties and services he performs, with the spiritual and holy commands of God; he is reminded of his guilt and depravity, and taught his constant need of repentance, forgiveness, the blood of Christ, and the supplies of his grace. Thus, he learns to walk humbly before God, however he may be distinguished among men; to be ashamed of such good works as he would otherwise admire; to count even his evangelical duties as dross in comparison of Christ and his righteousness; to be simple in his dependence on the Lord in all things ; and knowing that he hath not attained, “ to press forward to the mark, for the high calling of God in Christ Jesus.”

Having thus compendiously stated some of the leading uses of the moral law in subserviency to the gospel, it now remains to consider the bad effects which arise from ignorance, inattention, or confused apprehensions on this subject, in the ministers and professors of the gospel. We here suppose that the several doctrines of the gospel are stated and apprehended as fully as they can be, when the perfect law of God is greatly kept out of sight : for this must create considerable inconsistency in the best arranged system of evangelical doctrine. We observe also, that there are various degrees and kinds of ignorance and inattention to the law, or of a confused and unscriptural way of speaking about it. Some persons seem almost to leave it out of their system, or only to speak of it in depreciating terms : others advert to its strictness and severity, but they are not equally sensible of its excellency. Many are acquainted with its uses in convincing men of sin, but not of its value as a rule of conduct : others, on the contrary, apply its precepts to the regulation of the Christian’s conduct, but are less habituated to use them to alarm the consciences of unbelievers. But in proportion as any of these uses are neglected, some or other of the following effects may be apprehended.

I. Great numbers of those that hear and assent to the gospel, will remain destitute of any serious concern about their souls. Whatever men learn of Christ, and his love, or free salvation, they seldom count him the Pearl of great price, and consent to part with all for his sake, till they are made deeply sensible of their danger as lost perishing sinners. And it hath been shown that this is the grand scriptural means of bringing men to this conviction. A great part therefore of that want of success which some able men complain of, may fairly be ascribed to their failure in this particular.

II. Ignorance of, or inattention to the law, always occasions the prevalence or increase of a legal or self-righteous spirit. This propensity of our proud hearts is first broken, by perceiving in some measure how justly and certainly the law of God condemns even our best actions; because they are so defective in their motive and measure, and so defiled in themselves: and were we always influenced by a realizing conviction, that 'God deems us deserving of final condemnation, for not loving him with all our hearts;' our proneness to rely on our own works could not subsist, but we must draw all our confidence from the grace of the gospel. All other devices for curing this disease are mere palliatives: but the Apostle directs us to the radical cure, when he says, "I through the law, am dead to the law."

III. Ignorance of, or errors about the holy commandments of God, gives occasion to the increase of unsound professors of the gospel, whose scandalous lives, or awful apostacies, often disgrace the cause of truth. If men are allowed to consider the law of God as an enemy from which Christ came to deliver us; if they conclude that their natural dislike to it is excusable, their inability to keep it a misfortune, and their condemnation for breaking it an act of extreme rigour, bordering on injustice; if they suppose salvation to consist almost wholly in deliverance from condemnation, and do not in the least perceive that all true believers really repent of, and condemn themselves for breaking the law; are taught to love and delight in it, and are both required and inclined to testify the sincerity of their love by unreserved obedience to all its precepts; they will readily embrace a doctrine which gives relief to their uneasy consciences, and leaves the favourite lusts of their hearts unmolested. Thus stony-ground hearers, who welcome the gospel with impenitent joy, and then in time of temptation fall away; and thorny-ground hearers, who retain an unfruitful profession, with a worldly, covetous, or sensual life, will abound in the visible church; and be as Achans in the camp. No care indeed of man can wholly prevent this: but a clear and distinct view of the holy law of God, and its subserviency to the gospel, is one very important means of preventing such dreadful delusions, and such wide-spreading scandals.

IV. The prevalence of corrupt and heretical principles, originates from the same source. Perhaps it might be shown, that all anti-scriptural schemes of religion coincide in several particulars. They agree in considering the perfect law of God as too strict in its demands, and too severe in its penalty; and in supposing that it would be inconsistent with the divine justice and goodness, to deal with his rational creatures according to it. None of them allow expressly that Christ died, to honour this law, and to satisfy the justice of God for our transgressions of it, that he might save sinners without seeming to favour sin: but they suppose his death to have been designed exclusively for some other purposes. Nor do any of them consider a total change of nature and disposition, to be absolutely necessary to salvation; but all of them explain regeneration to mean something very different from, and far beneath this new creation unto holiness. They who differ and dispute the most eagerly about other points, when their sentiments are carefully examined, are found to harmonize in these particulars. The philosophical Socinian, who rejects the doctrine of the atonement as needless, and the eternity of future punishment as unjust; here joins issue with the antinomian, or enthusiast, who, boasting of free grace and extraordinary illuminations, reviles and tramples on the law which Christ died to magnify and honour. Almost all errors in religion connect with misapprehensions about the law of God; ignorance, inattention, and confused views of it, must therefore tend exceedingly to favour the propagation of heretical opinions of various kinds.

A few instances may be mentioned. It would not be so common, as far as we can see, for those who have been educated in evangelical principles, to diverge into Arian or Socinian sentiments, if a deep and clear knowledge of the demands, excellency, and uses of the law, were connected with their views of human depravity, redemption, justification, and regeneration; to assist them in understanding the real nature and necessity of the great doctrines of salvation. For want of this, when they are pressed by subtile reasonings on such subjects, they know not what to answer, and so give up the truth as untenable on rational grounds ; instead of perceiving that it has its foundation in the nature of things, in the divine perfections, and in our condition as transgressors, and as creatures continually propense to transgress.—We can hardly conceive that men professing godliness, could ever have fancied themselves perfectly free from all sin, and so have been seduced into a most disgraceful and injurious kind of self-preference and spiritual pride, if they had been previously well grounded in the knowledge of the extensive demands of the divine law.—The mystic who places the whole of his religion on the internal feelings of his mind, or what he calls the voice or the moving of the Spirit ; whilst the doctrine of the atonement, the life of faith in a crucified Saviour, the written word, and the means of grace, are contemptuously disregarded by him ; and the antimonian, who is satisfied with what Christ has done for him, and perceives no want of a renovation to the divine image, or a personal holiness of heart and life ; must alike stand confuted, if the real nature, excellency, and uses of the holy law were clearly discovered to them. But where this is overlooked, some of these perversions of the gospel will insinuate themselves, and prey insensibly on the vitals of true religion, whatever attempts be made to exclude or eradicate them.

V. Through ignorance of the law, real Christians habitually neglect duties, commit sins, or give way to evil tempers, to the discredit of the gospel, or to the hindrance of their own fruitfulness, comfort, and growth in grace. It has frequently happened, that ministers have heard some of their people acknowledge, after receiving practical instructions, that they had not before been sensible that such or such things were sins ; or that this or the other was a duty incumbent on them : nay, the meditation on such subjects has sometimes the same effect on the ministers themselves. The knowledge of the precepts, therefore, is the proper method of rendering believers "complete in the will of God in all wisdom and spiritual understanding," and in bringing them "to walk worthy of God unto all well pleasing:" and consequently inattention to it must proportionably produce the contrary effects. (Col. i. 9. 10.)

VI. Lastly. The Scriptures enlarge in commendation of the divine commandments, and in exhorting men to abound in the work of the Lord, and to be zealous of good works: but many who profess or preach evangelical truth, speak very little on these subjects, except in an unguarded depreciating manner: hence additional prejudices are excited in men's minds against the doctrines of grace, as subversive of holy practice. But if the nature, use, excellency, and necessity of good works, as the fruits and evidences of true faith, were more fully understood; and the preceptive part of the Bible, in subserviency to the gospel, were more prominent in men's discourses and conduct, such objections would be confuted; and they would "be put to shame, who should falsely accuse" either our holy doctrine, or "good conversation in Christ Jesus."

ESSAY XVI.

On the Believer's Warfare and Experience.

THE sacred Scriptures always represent the true Christian, as a soldier engaged in an arduous warfare with potent enemies, against whom he is supported, and over whom he is made victorious, by the gracious influences of the Holy Spirit, through faith in the Lord Jesus, the Captain of our salvation, and by obeying his commands. Such expressions as fighting, striving, and wrestling, with frequent and varied allusions to military affairs, imply an experience essentially different from that of those persons, who never engaged in the conflict, or who have already obtained the conqueror's palm: nor can any hope, or even assurance of victory and triumph, or any intervening seasons of peace and joy, entirely preclude this difference. The distinction, therefore, between the church militant on earth and the church triumphant in heaven, hath on good grounds been established; and they, who do not well understand and consider it, will be very liable to fall into several injurious, discouraging, disgraceful, or even fatal mistakes. In discussing the subject, we may first briefly consider the distinguishing principles, purposes, and desires of the persons who are engaged in this warfare:—we may next enumerate the enemies, with whom especially they are called to contend:—we may briefly mention the encouragements, supports, and aids vouchsafed them; the weapons with which they fight, and the manner in which they must put on, and use their armour:—we may then advert to the nature and effects of their victories; and conclude with a few hints on the appropriate experience that must result from their situation.

I. Then, we speak not in this place, of the whole multitude who are called Christians, or who profess to believe the Scriptures: neither do we include all, who subscribe or dispute for the several doctrines, that constitute the grand peculiarities of the Christian faith; nor the whole company who compose any peculiar sect or denomination, to the exclusion of others. In respect of all such collective bodies, we are, alas! constrained to allow, that but few comparatively “strive to enter in at the strait gate.” (Matt. vii. 13, 14. Luke xiii. 23—30.) A vast majority of them all frequent the “broad road that leadeth to destruction,” “hold the truth in unrighteousness, and walk according to the course of this world.” Many of them indeed observe Gamaliel’s cautious advice, and are not openly united with those, “who fight against God:” but then, they aim to observe an impracticable and inadmissible neutrality, and know nothing of ‘fighting under the banner of Christ against the world, the flesh, and the devil, and of being his faithful soldiers to the end of their lives;’

unless they have read or heard it, in the form of baptism, or have been taught any thing about it from some orthodox catechism. But the persons, of whom this Essay treats, are those of every name, who, by "obeying the truth," have been "made free from sin, and become the servants of God." Most of them remember the time, when "they were foolish, disobedient, deceived; serving divers lusts and pleasures, living in malice and envy, hateful, and hating one another;" (Tit. iii. 3—7.) but "God, who is rich in mercy, of his great love, wherewith he loved them, even when they were dead in sin, hath quickened them." (Eph. ii. 1—10.) Thus "being born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible," they were enlightened to see something of the glory of God, the evil of sin, the value and danger of their souls, and their need of mercy, grace, and salvation. They were effectually warned to flee from the wrath to come, and led to repent and turn to God, to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, to renounce their former hopes, and to believe in Christ that they might be justified by faith. Having been thus taught "to count all but loss, for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ," they are prepared to deny themselves, bear the cross, labour, venture, suffer, and part with all for his sake. In this manner they have been "delivered from the power of darkness, and translated into the kingdom of the beloved Son of God;" they separate from his enemies, and join themselves to his friends; they throw down the arms of their rebellion, and "put on the whole armour of God;" they deliberately enlist under the banner of Christ; consider his people, cause, and honour, as their own, and his enemies within and around them as equally hostile to them also. Under the conduct of divine grace, these consecrated warriors "strive against sin," seeking the destruction of the kingdom of Satan, in their hearts and in the world, as far as their influence can reach; and do not, when most themselves, so much as entertain one thought of making any peace or truce with the enemies of Christ and of their immortal souls. Holiness, (or conformity to the law and moral perfections of God,) they deem their health and liberty, and sin their disease, bondage, and misery; they regard themselves as bound, by the strongest and endearing obligations, to devote themselves wholly to the service of their God and Saviour; they esteem the interests of evangelical truth and vital godliness, as of the utmost importance to the happiness of mankind; and they expect their present comfort, as well as their future felicity, from communion with God and the enjoyment of his favour.

But various inward and outward impediments and obstructions combine to counteract these desires, and to prevent these principles from producing their full effect; and whilst they struggle to exert themselves, notwithstanding this opposition, a conflict ensues to which all rational creatures in the universe, who are not thus circumstanced, must of course remain strangers; even as none but soldiers in actual service, experience the dangers, hardships, and sufferings of a military life. The regenerate person as really loves God, and desires to obey, honour, worship, and please him, and for his sake to act properly towards his brethren, as angels in heaven do; and at those times, when his heart is enlarged in holy contemplations, he longs to be perfectly holy, obedient, and spiritual; then the principles of the new man vigorously exert themselves; and the remains of corrupt nature, or of the old man, lie comparatively dormant; the world is greatly out of sight, or stripped of its attractions; and the enemies of his soul are restrained from assaulting him. But when the Christian hath left his closet, or the house of God, and is returned to the employments of his station in life; he finds himself unable to realize his previous views, or to accomplish the purposes which he most uprightly formed; and he often wonders to find himself so different a person from what he was a few hours before. This however is only partial and temporary; the better principles implanted in his soul, counteract and prevent the effect of corrupt passions and external objects, and shortly resume a more decided ascendancy. So that upon the whole, the believer successfully opposes sin, asserts his liberty, and serves God; and his state is determined by this habitual prevalence; for "he walks not after the flesh, but after the Spirit."

A conflict of this kind may easily be perceived to be a very different thing from the feeble and occasioned interruptions, which an unregenerate man sometimes experiences in following the habitual inclinations of his heart. These arise only from convictions of conscience, fear of consequences, or selfish hopes; while his desires and affections are wholly fixed on carnal things, he cannot properly be said to have so much as one just idea of spiritual good; and religion is his task, of which he performs no more than what his fears or hopes impose upon him. Yet these very distinct cases are often confounded, and this produces much mischief.

It is however requisite more particularly to enumerate and consider the enemies, with whom the Christian soldier is called to encounter, if we would fully understand the important subject. The Apostle, having said, "The flesh lusteth against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh; and these are contrary the one to the other, so that ye cannot do the things that ye would;" proceeds to show what are the works of the flesh, and the fruits of the Spirit, (Gal. v. 17—23.) from which enumeration it is evident, that the flesh signifies our whole nature as born of Adam's fallen race, with all its propensities, animal and intellectual, as they are contrary to the spiritual commands of God; and that "the spirit as striving against it," signifies the work of the Holy Spirit, renewing our souls to holiness, and so teaching, disposing, and enabling us to love and serve God. "For that which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is Spirit."

If we then carefully examine the nature of man, we shall find, that a disposition to depart from God, and idolatrously to love and seek felicity from the creature, is common to our whole species; and from this general principle, according to different men's constitutions, educations, habits, connexions, or circumstances, some are more prone to avarice, some to ambition, some to sensual indulgence, and others to malignant passions, with every possible variation. These propensities, being excited by temptation, gathering force by gratification, triumphing over shame and conscience, and irritated by the interference of those who pursue the same objects, hurry men into every kind of excess; burst forth into all the variety of crimes that have prevailed in every age and nation; and produce all sorts of immorality in men's conduct towards each other, and all impiety, blasphemy, and other daring offences, against the Almighty Governor of the Universe. And as he who attempts to force his way against a torrent best knows its strength; so none are so well acquainted with the power of corrupt propensities and habits, as they that resolutely endeavour to overcome and extirpate them. When, therefore, holy principles have been implanted in the heart by the Spirit of God, and a man sees the urgent necessity, and feels the ardent desire, "of crucifying the flesh with its affections and lusts;" then his conflict begins; for pride, anger, envy, malice, avarice, or sensual lusts, being no longer allowed to domineer, abide, like a dethroned tyrant, and have a strong party in the soul; and consequently they oppose and counteract the best desires and purposes of the believer, and engage him in a perpetual contest. At some times they find him off his guard, and gain a temporary advantage, which makes work for deep repentance; at all times they impede his progress, mingle pollution in his services, and interrupt his endeavours to glorify God and adorn the gospel. These things are generally most painfully experienced, in respect of such sins as had by any means previously acquired the ascendancy over him; and in proportion to the degree in which he remits watchfulness and prayer; but even those evil propensities, from which a man before thought himself most free, will be found on trial to possess great power in his soul.

The Apostle gives us in his own case a very particular account of the believer's conflict with these enemies, (Rom. vii. 14—25.) for we may be confident, that no man except the true believer, "delights in the law of God," "serves it with his mind," "hates all sin," and "has a will" to every part of the spiritual service of God; nor can we suppose, that Paul would say, "I myself," if he meant another person of an opposite character; or use the present tense throughout, if he had referred to his past experience in an unconverted state. The whole of the passage most aptly describes the case of a man who loves God and his service, and would obey and glorify him as angels do; but who finds the remainder of evil propensities and habits continually impeding, and often prevailing against him; yet resolutely maintains the combat with these enemies, as determined if possible entirely to extirpate them; and at the same time feels himself more pained by the opposition made by his sins to the best desires of his heart, than by all his persecutions or afflictions; and rejoices notwithstanding in the mercy and grace of the gospel, and in the prospect of complete and final deliverance.

Indeed, all the falls, defects, complaints, rebukes, chastenings, and confessions, of believers in every part of the Scripture, undeniably imply the same conflict. We read not of any one who explicitly spoke of himself, or was spoken of by others, as free from all remains of sin, and made perfect in holiness, or as having accomplished his warfare whilst he lived in this world; we must therefore conclude, that those persons who now profess to have attained to this kind of perfection, are in this respect deceived, or use words without a proper attention to their import. If the inward enemy were quite slain, and we could in this sense adopt the words of Christ, "the prince of this world cometh, and hath nothing in me;" the rest of our conflict would be comparatively easy; but whilst this cause still subsists, we must expect at times to have our joys interrupted by sighs, and groans, and tears, and trembling, till we are removed to a better world.

We should, however, recollect the Apostle's words, " We wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places," (Eph. vi. 10—18.) The Scriptures continually lead our thoughts to these invisible enemies, the fallen angels, or evil spirits. A kingdom of darkness and iniquity is spoken of, as established under Satan the arch-apostate, consisting of vast numbers of his associates in rebellion. These differ in capacity and influence ; but are all replete with pride, enmity, envy, deceit, and every detestable propensity ; and their natural sagacity and powers are increased by long experience in the work of destruction. The entrance of sin by Adam's fall is ascribed to their ambition, envy, malice, and subtlety ; and ungodly men are uniformly considered as their slaves, yea, as their children. Satan is called the god and prince of this world : this old serpent " deceiveth the nations," yea, " the whole world ;" and he " taketh sinners captive at his will : " conversion is stated to consist in " turning from Satan to God." This " adversary, as a roaring lion, goeth about seeking whom he may devour ;" and he " transforms himself into an angel of light," to deceive the unwary. The whole company of evil spirits are represented, as counteracting, by every possible effort, the endeavours of the Lord's servants to promote his cause ; as harassing those by temptations whom they cannot destroy ; and as desiring to sift and assault them. They are spoken of as putting all kinds of wickedness into men's hearts, and as filling their hearts ; as the original authors of all heresies, persecutions, delusions, and apostasies ; and in short, as " working in the children of disobedience *."

* 1 Kings xxii. 20—24. Job i. 6—12. Luke viii. 12. xxii. 31. John viii. 44. xiii. 2. 27. xiv. 30. Acts v. 3. xxvi. 18. 2 Cor. ii. 11. iv. 4. xi. 14. Eph. ii. 2. 2 Tim. ii. 26. 1 John iii. 10. Rev. xii. 9, 10. xx. 2, 3. 7—10.

We must therefore ascribe it wholly to the subtlety of the devil, who prospers most when least suspected, that the sadducean spirit of the age hath so much discarded the language of the oracles of God, and hath so far prevailed to bring this doctrine into contempt. In this way self-wise men are outwitted by these sagacious deceivers, and then are employed by them to delude others also into a fatal security. Were it not for the depravity of our hearts, these enemies would not have so much power against us; and their suggestions do not excuse the sins which we voluntarily commit. But as they prevail most fatally to deceive the world in general; so believers must expect to have a sharp conflict with them; not only as they act by their servants, (such as infidels, persecutors, false teachers, scorners, flatterers, calumniators, seducers, and many others;) but immediately by their suggestions and assaults. They seem especially to have access to the imagination; where they present such illusions, as excite the corrupt affections of the heart, or impose upon the understanding. Thus they draw men into error, by stirring up their pride, prejudices, and lusts, which darken and confuse the judgment. They often present such thoughts to the mind, as fill it with gloom and dejection, or with distressing doubts, and hard thoughts of God; and by suggesting such things as the soul abhors, and by all imaginable contrivances, they tempt men to neglect the means of grace, the duties of their several stations, or the improvement of their talents. But enough has been said to show that we are called to conflict with evil spirits, who know where we are most vulnerable, and when most off our guard: whose fiery darts are as suited to excite our passions, as the spark is to kindle the most inflammable materials; who constantly aim to deceive, defile, discourage, or impede our course; and with whom we must expect every day to wrestle, though some are comparatively evil days, when they have peculiar advantages in assaulting us.

The believer is also engaged in an arduous conflict with-this evil world, which is Satan's grand engine in all his stratagems and assaults. He uses the things of the world as his baits, or proposed premiums, by which to allure men to disobedience: "All," or some of "these will I give thee," is still one grand argument in his temptations. Nor is this only the case, when the conduct suggested is evil in itself, and wealth, honour, or pleasure, is annexed to it: but more commonly he prevails by seducing us into an inexpedient or excessive use, or pursuit of worldly things. Thus ambushments are concealed in every business, connexion, relation, recreation, or company: and the world prevails against us, by inducing us to waste our time, to mis-spend what is intrusted to us, to omit opportunities of usefulness, and to indulge inordinate or idolatrous affection towards the creatures. The evil things of the world, as we deem them, are likewise employed by Satan, to deter us from the profession of our faith, and the performance of our duty. Thus many are seduced into sinful compliances, and led to renounce or dissemble their religion; lest they should be ridiculed, reproached, forsaken of their friends, or exposed to hardships and persecutions; and then they flatter themselves, that this prudence will enable them to do the more good, till the event confutes the vain imagination. Near relations, beloved friends, liberal benefactors, admired superiors, as well as powerful opposers, are often, in this respect, dangerous foes. Riches and poverty, youth and old age, reputation and authority, or the contrary, have their several snares: whilst politeness and rude insolence, company and retirement, assault the soul in different ways. These few hints may show, in what the believer's conflict consists, and to what continual dangers it must expose him.

When, indeed, we seriously consider the variety of those obstacles which interrupt our course, the number, power, and malice of our enemies, the sinfulness and treachery of our own hearts, our weakness, and our exposed condition; we may well say, "who is sufficient for these things?" or what hope is there of success in this unequal contest? But a proper attention to the Scriptures will convince us, that there is no ground for despondency, or even for discouragement; as the Lord assures us, that he will strengthen, assist, uphold, and never forsake his redeemed people. We ought not therefore to fear our enemies; because He will be with us; "and if God be for us, who can be against us?" Or who can doubt but "He that is in us is greater, than he that is in the world?" This was typically intimated in the promises made to Israel, respecting their wars with the Canaanites and other nations, which were shadows and figures of the good fight of faith*: We are, therefore, exhorted "to be strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might:" for "they, that wait on the Lord, shall renew their strength;" "and JEHOVAH, in whom is everlasting strength, is become our salvation." All power in heaven and earth is vested in the LORD OUR RIGHTEOUSNESS. He is Head over all things to his church; and his servants have always found, that in proportion as they simply trusted in him, "they could do all things," and that "when they were weak, then were they strong; for the power of Christ rested upon them," (2 Cor. xii. 9—11. Phil. iv. 13.) He restrains and moderates, as he sees good, the assaults of our outward enemies, or confounds their devices, and defeats their deep laid machinations; all providential dispensations are directed by him, nor can any tribulation or temptation exceed the bounds he assigns, though all the powers of earth and hell should combine against one feeble saint; whilst the Holy Spirit communicates strength to our faith, fear, love, hope, patience, and every principle of the new man; imparts strong consolations and heavenly joys; effectually restrains the energy of corrupt passions, and disposes us to self-denial, to bear the cross, to persevere in well-doing, and to dread sin, and separation from Christ, or even dishonouring him, more than any other evil that can befall us. Supported, strengthened, and encouraged in this manner, believers have in every age been enabled "to fight the good fight of faith," and to "overcome every foe, by the blood of the Lamb, and the word of their testimony, and have not loved their lives unto the death," (Rev. xii. 11.) Nay, they have generally acquitted themselves most honourably, when their adversaries were most formidable, and their temptations apparently most invincible; because they were then most simply dependent, and most fervent in praying for the all-sufficient grace of the Lord Jesus, and most steadfast in contemplating his sufferings and the glory that followed.

In order to maintain this conflict, with good hope of success, we must "take to ourselves," and "put on the whole armour of God." Conscious sincerity in our profession of the gospel, must be "as the girdle of our loins," without which we shall be entangled, and embarrassed in all our conduct: an habitual obedient regard to our Lord's commands, as the rule of righteousness, must be our breast-plate in facing our foes; whilst a distinct knowledge, and cordial reception of the "gospel of peace," and the way of access, pardon, reconciliation, and acceptance in the divine Saviour, must be the shoes of our feet, our only effectual preparation for firmly standing our ground, or comfortably marching to meet our assailants. Above all, faith, or a firm belief of the truths, and reliance on the promises of God, must be our "shield," with which we may ward off and extinguish the "fiery darts of Satan," and prevent their fatal effects. Hope of present support and heavenly felicity, must be as a helmet to cover our head in the day of battle; and with the plain testimonies, precepts, promises, and instructions of the word of God, as "with the sword of the Spirit," we must, (after our Lord's example,) repel the tempter, and so resist him, that he may flee from us, (Eph. vi. 10—18. 1 Thess. v. 5, 6.) In short, "the weapons of our warfare are not carnal:" worldly wisdom, philosophical reasonings, and our own native strength and resolution, (like Saul's armour when put upon David,) can only encumber us. But when conscious of our weakness and unworthiness, and distrusting our own hearts, we "strive against sin, looking unto Jesus," relying on his power, truth, and grace, and observing his directions ; when we aim to do his will, to seek his glory, and copy his example ; then indeed we are armed for the battle ; and however men may despise our weapons, (as Goliah did David the shepherd with his staff, his sling, and stones,) we shall not be put to shame in the event, but shall be made more than conquerors over every inward and outward foe. This armour is prepared in Christ "our wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption ;" and in "his fulness of grace : " we take it to ourselves by the prayer of faith, " by searching and meditating on the Scriptures, and attendance on the means of grace. By watchfulness, sobriety, habitual circumspection, and caution, we put it on, and keep it bright ; and thus we are continually prepared for the conflict, and not liable to be surprisèd unawares, or to fall into the ambushments of our vigilant enemies, (Matt. xxvi. 41. Luke xxi. 34—36. Rom. xiii. 11—14. 1 Pet. v. 8, 9.) And when we live at peace with our brethren, and pray for, warn, counsel, and encourage them also ; we fight the good fight, as a part of the great army, which is enlisted under the Redeemer's standard, to wage war against sin, the world, and the powers of darkness.

As far as we are enabled, in this manner, successfully to oppose our own corrupt passions and various temptations, we gain victories which afford us present comforts, lively hopes, and discoveries, of the Lord's love to our souls ; and hereafter "glory, honour, and immortality." Our Captain assures every one of his soldiers of this inestimable recompense ; and if they be slain in the conflict, this will only put them more speedily in possession of the conqueror's crown. In respect of others, our warfare is directed to the encouragement and help of our fellow soldiers ; the salvation, (not the destruction,) of our fellow sinners ; the benefit of all around us ; and above all the honour of our divine Saviour, by the spread of the gospel among men ; while our bold profession of the truth, our exemplary conduct, expansive benevolence, fervent prayers, improvement of talents, and unremitting attention to the duties of our several stations, with quietness and prudence, as well as zeal, are peculiarly suitable to promote these important ends. The religion of Jesus is thus continued from age to age, by the conversion of sinners to the faith: and though the seed of the serpent still bruises the Redeemer's heel, in the sufferings of his people; yet Satan is, as it were, put under the feet of every true Christian at death; and Christ will at length finally and completely crush his head; whilst all his faithful soldiers shall attend his triumphs and share his glory.

It must appear from this compendious view of our conflicts, that all, who are really engaged in them, experience a variety of changing emotions in their minds, to which others remain entire strangers. They must often mourn their ill success, or that of the common cause, or rejoice in the advantages attained or hoped for. Sometimes they are ashamed and alarmed by being baffled, and at others they resume courage and return to the conflict. They always come far short of that entire victory over their appetites, passions, and temptations, to which they aspire; and they cannot therefore be so calm, as indifference would render them. Much self-denial must be required in such a case, and perpetual fears of being surprised by the enemy. Yet their alarms, tears, groans, and complaints, are evidences that they are Christ's disciples; their joys, with which a stranger intermeddled not, far more than counterbalance their sorrows, and they can often triumph in the assured hope of final victory and felicity, even amidst the hardships and sufferings of the field of battle.

ESSAY XVII.

On the Privileges enjoyed by the True Believer.

THE sacred oracles continually teach us, that the upright servant of God, (notwithstanding his mourning for sin, and all his conflicts, fears, chastenings, and tribulations.)

is favoured and happy above all other men, even in this present world; for when the Apostle observed, that "if in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men the most miserable;" he only meant, that if a Christian could be deprived of the hope of heaven, and all those earnest, consolations, and lively affections which result from it, his peculiar trials, his tenderness of conscience, his antipathy to sin, and his thirstings after God and holiness, would be superadded to the ordinary burdens of life, without any proportionable counterpoise to them. But as this is not, and cannot be, the case; so the Christian, with the hope of glory, and his other peculiar privileges, may be, and actually is, in proportion to his diligence and fruitfulness, of all men the most happy. In order to evince this truth, it may be useful to appropriate this Essay to the consideration of the most distinguished privileges of the real Christian, which no other man in the world can share with him: for they constitute "a joy with which a stranger intermeddeth not;" even "the secret of the Lord, which is with them that fear him." (Ps. xxv. xiv. Prov. xiv. 10. Rev. ii. 17.) And it may be premised, that a disposition supremely to desire and diligently to seek after all these blessings, as the felicity in which our souls delight, and with which they would be satisfied, is one grand evidence that we are actually interested in them.

I. Every real Christian is actually pardoned and justified in the sight of God: and "Blessed is he whose transgression is forgiven; whose sin is covered: blessed is the man unto whom the Lord imputeth not iniquity." (Ps. xxxii. 1, 2. Rom. iv. 6—8.) Among a number of condemned criminals, that man would be deemed the happiest who had obtained the king's pardon; though others were more accomplished, or better clothed: for he would expect, in cheerful hope, the opening of his prison door to set him at liberty from his confinement, and to restore him to the comforts of life; and this hope would render the temporary hardships of his situation more tolerable: whereas the rest would dread the hour, when they were to be brought out of their cells to an ignominious and agonizing execution; and this prospect would add to the gloom and horror of the dungeon. We all are criminals: death terminates our confinement in this vile body, and this evil world; at that important moment the pardoned sinner goes to heaven, the unpardoned sinner drops into hell: and, except as the former has his views darkened by temptation, and by fatherly rebukes for his misconduct; or, as the latter has his fears obviated by infidelity, and dissipated by intoxicating pleasures and pursuits; the very thought of this closing scene, and its most interesting consequences, must have a vast effect in rendering them happy or miserable, even during the uncertain term of their remaining lives. Nothing can be more evident, than that the Scripture declares the sins of all believers to be actually pardoned, and their persons completely justified. "There is," says the Apostle, "no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit." "Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth. Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died; yea, rather is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us." (Rom. viii. 1. 33, 34.) And our Lord assures us, not only that "he who believeth is not condemned," but also that "he hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation." (John iii. 14—21. v. 24.)

The same privilege was proposed to the old testament church; when the prophet, speaking of repentance and conversion, (the concomitants and evidences of true faith, says, in the name of Jehovah, "If the wicked will turn from all his sins that he hath committed, and do that which is lawful and right, he shall surely live, he shall not die; all his transgressions that he hath committed, they shall not be mentioned unto him." (Ezek. xviii. 21, 22. 27, 28.) In other places the Lord speaks of "blotting out the sins" of his people, and "remembering them no more," and of "casting them into the depths of the sea." (Is. xliii. 25.

xliv. 22. Jer. xxxi. 34. Mic. vii. 19.) The Apostle assures us, that “all who believe are justified from all things;” that “the blood of Christ cleanseth from all sin;” and that even little children in Christ “have their sins forgiven them, for his name sake:” (Acts iii. 19. xiii. 38, 39. Cor. v. 19. 1 John i. 7. ii. 12.) So that the forgiveness and justification of believers are stated to be already past; and their deliverance from condemnation is not represented as a future contingency, but secured to them by an irrevocable grant: “being justified by faith, they have peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ.”

But, though this be the privilege of all true believers without exception; yet the actual assurance that the blessing belongs to them is possessed only by some, and only at times even by many of these: for true faith may be very weak; and it may connect with a confused judgment, a considerable degree of ignorance, many prejudices or mistakes, and sometimes a comparative prevalence of carnal affections. In such circumstances a man may believe with a trembling faith, and cry out with tears, “Lord, help my unbelief:” or he may firmly credit the testimony, and rely on the promises of God, with a full persuasion of his power and willingness to perform them; and yet doubt whether he do not presume and deceive himself, in supposing his faith to be of a saving nature: and in various ways a man may doubt whether he be a true believer, though he do not doubt but that Christ will certainly save all true believers. Nay, the frame even of a real Christian’s mind, and the present tenor of his conduct, may render such doubts reasonable and the necessary consequence of faith: for if a man yield to those evils which the Scripture enumerates as marks of unconversion, the more entirely he credits the divine testimony, the greater reason will he have to call his own state in question; till such time as his convictions have produced a proper effect upon his conduct. I suppose when Paul told the Galatians, that “he stood in doubt of them,” he meant to induce them to stand in doubt of themselves; and "to examine whether they were in the faith," or whether they had hitherto deceived themselves. We are, therefore, directed to give diligence both to obtain and to preserve, "the full assurance of hope:" (Heb. vi. 11. 2 Pet. i. 10.) but this would not be proper advice, if saving faith consisted in being sure of an interest in Christ; which doctrine, (though incautiously maintained by some very respectable persons.) is evidently suited to discourage feeble believers, and to bolster up the false confidence of hypocrites. In proportion as it is manifest that we are regenerate, that our faith is living, that it works by love, and is accompanied by repentance, and that we partake of the "sanctification of the Spirit unto obedience;" we may be sure that our sins are pardoned, and that all the promises of God shall be accomplished to us. Yet misapprehension, and excessive fear of being deceived in a concern of infinite moment, exclude many who have these evidences, from enjoying this assurance, except when immediately favoured with the consolations of the Spirit; whilst conformity to the world, in this day of outward peace and prosperity, prevents many others from attaining to that decision of character which warrants it; and an abatement in diligence and fervency of affection causes others to lose the assurance which once they enjoyed, and to walk in doubt and darkness, because they have grieved their holy Comforter. Hence it appears, that the assurance of salvation is rather the gracious recompense of a fruitful and diligent profession of the gospel, than the privilege of all who are in a state of acceptance. And though all doubts may originate indirectly, or remotely, from unbelief, either total or partial; for lively vigorous faith, working by fervent love, would soon disperse them; yet frequently they are evidences that a man credits the testimony of God, concerning the deceitfulness of the heart, the subtlety of Satan and the characters of those who are in the broad, and those who are in the narrow way. These same observations are equally applicable to all the other privileges which we are about to consider ; for in every one of them, the distinction between a title to the blessing in the sight of God, and the actual assurance and enjoyment of it in our own souls, should be carefully noted ; the former is not affected by the believer's varied success in his spiritual warfare ; the latter must be continually influenced by the assaults and temptations of the enemy, and by his own conduct respecting them.

II. The true Christian as "justified by faith," "is reconciled to God:" a perfect amity succeeds, a covenant of peace and friendship is, as it were, signed and ratified ; and he is therefore honoured by the appellation of "the friend of God." When we contemplate the infinite majesty, authority, justice, and holiness of the Lord, and contrast with them, the meanness, guilt, pollution, provocations, and ingratitude with which we are chargeable ; when we consider, that He could easily, and might justly, have destroyed us ; that we cannot profit him, and that he could have created by his powerful word innumerable millions of nobler creatures to do him service ; and when we further advert to the enmity of the carnal mind against his omniscience, omnipotence, holiness, righteousness, truth, sovereignty, service, cause, and people ; we shall perceive, that we never can sufficiently admire his marvellous love, and our own unspeakable felicity, in being admitted to this blessed peace and friendship with the God of heaven, which is still more enhanced by the consideration, that "Christ is our Peace," and that "he made peace through the blood of his cross," (Eph. ii. 14—19. Col. i. 14—22.) Nor can the advantages resulting from it be sufficiently valued. Whilst believers, by the grace bestowed on them, are taught to love the character, servants, cause, truths, precepts, and worship of God ; to hate the things which He hates, to separate from his enemies, and to seek their liberty and felicity in his service ; the Lord considers all kindnesses or injuries done to them as done to himself ; and "will bless those that bless them, and curse those that curse them." All his perfections, which before seemed with united force to ensure their destruction, now harmoniously engage to make them happy. His wisdom chooses their inheritance, his omniscience and omnipresence are their ever watchful guard, his omnipotence their protector, his veracity and faithfulness their unfailing security; his satisfied justice, connected with mercy, vindicates their rights, and recompenses the fruits of his grace; and his bounty surely supplies all their wants. Nor does the Lord conceal from these his friends the reasons of his conduct, in such matters as in any respect concern them, (Gen. xviii. 17—19. John xv. 15.) and he encourages them to open their inmost souls and to pour out their sorrows and fears before him; so that they can rejoice that he is acquainted with those things, which they could not mention to the dearest and most intimate of their earthly friends. But indeed, this privilege of reconciliation to God, and friendship with him, comprises all our other blessings and expectations, here and hereafter; though it may be more instructive to speak of them under different heads.

III. The believer is also adopted into the family of God, and admitted to all the honour and felicity of his beloved children. “Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed on us, that we should be called the sons of God!” (1 John iii. 1.) “According as he hath chosen us in Christ before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before him in love; having predestinated us unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ unto himself, according to the good pleasure of his will, to the praise of the glory of his grace.” (Eph. i. 3—15.) He therefore thus addresses us by his word, “Come ye out from among them, and be ye separate—and I will receive you, and ye shall be my sons and my daughters, saith the Lord Almighty.” (2 Cor. vi. 17, 18.) This call being accompanied by the regenerating power of the Holy Spirit, our minds are influenced to obey it; thus we are brought “to repentance—and faith in Christ,” our sins are pardoned, and we pass from the family and kingdom of the wicked one, into the household of God, by a gracious adoption.

tion.—This term was borrowed from the custom of the ancients, who frequently took the children of other persons, and by a solemn legal process adopted them into their own families, gave them their names, educated them as their own, and left their estates to them. So that regeneration communicates to the soul a divine nature, and makes us the children of God; and adoption recognizes us as such, and admits us to the enjoyment of the privileges belonging to that relation. Thus pardoned rebels become the children and heirs of the almighty and everlasting God, by faith in Jesus Christ. (Gal. iii. 26.) But what words can express the value of this distinguished privilege! The adoption of the meanest beggar, or the vilest traitor, into the family of the greatest monarch, to be the heir of all his dignities, would produce but a trivial alteration in his circumstances: for vexation, sickness, death, would still await him; and the distance between the mightiest and the most abject of men, or creatures, is as nothing compared with that which subsists between the great Creator and all the works of his hands. (Is. xl. 13—26.) This adoption as the children of God is not a mere name; it is a substantial good, an honour, a dignity, and an advantage that eclipses, and, as it were, swallows up all other benefits which can be obtained by any creature! “If children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ;” and we may be sure that every thing which can prepare us for, and put us in possession of our incorruptible and eternal inheritance, will be conferred by the love and bounty of our Almighty Friend and Father. But “we know not what we shall be:” “Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him.” Lest, however, we should imagine, that any possible honour, advantage, or felicity was excepted, when the inheritance of the children of God was mentioned; he hath been pleased to expand our views, and enlarge our expectations, by language taken from all the other most endeared relations of life. The obedient disciples of Christ are his brethren, his sisters, and his mothers; yea, their "Maker is their husband, the Lord of Hosts is his Name." (Is. liv. 5. Matt. xii. 46—50. Eph. v. 25—27.)

They who are thus adopted into the family of God, receive the Spirit of adoption, (instead of the spirit of bondage,) and are disposed and encouraged to say, "Abba, Father;" or to address him as their Father, whatever language they speak, or to whatever country they belong. We must not understand this expression merely as denoting a confidence that God is our Father: for believers are often actuated by the spirit of adoption, when harassed with doubts whether they be children of God or not; and numbers have an overbearing confidence of their adoption, while their actions demonstrate that they belong to another family. (John viii. 41—47.) The spirit of adoption indeed more properly belongs to the believer's temper and character than to his privileges: yet it is necessary here to observe in general, that the Holy Spirit, by producing in us that disposition towards God which a dutiful son bears towards a wise and good father, manifests our regeneration and adoption, and "bears witness with our spirits, that we are the children and heirs of God:" and whilst we feel our minds habitually influenced to apply to him in all our difficulties, to revere him, rely on, love, and obey him, to seek his glory, and rejoice in the success of the gospel and the prosperity of his people; we have "the witness in ourselves," that we are born of God, and adopted into his family; even though weakness of faith, misapprehension, or temptation should create an hesitation in our minds whilst addressing him as our Father. This privilege, therefore, consists in the allowance and liberty of approaching the Lord at all times, and for all things; of intrusting all our concerns in his hands, and of considering them all as managed by him, in perfect wisdom, truth, and love, for our present and everlasting good. Indeed the very disposition, produced by the Spirit of adoption, is our privilege, and constitutes the seal, the first fruits, and the earnest of our felicity. (Rom. viii. 14—17. Gal. iv. 6, 7.)

IV. The believer has the firmest ground of confidence that all his temporal wants will be supplied, and that every thing which can possibly conduce to his advantage, will be conferred on him by his Almighty Friend and Father. We are not indeed authorized to expect, or allowed to desire great things for ourselves in this world: and it is evident to every reflecting person, that power, wealth, or constant prosperity have so great a tendency to excite the envy or enmity of others, and to inflame the corrupt passions of their possessors, that they add nothing to the real enjoyment of life. He, who hath the security of the promise and providence of God, is far more sure never to want any thing really good for him; than they are, who possess the greatest wealth; for riches often strangely "make themselves wings and flee away;" but the unchangeable God, the possessor of heaven and earth, who has all hearts in his hands, can never be unable to provide for those that trust in him. "Bread shall be given you, your water shall be sure." "Verily ye shall be fed." "Your Father knoweth what things ye have need of;" and "a little which the righteous hath, is better than the riches of many wicked*." It is then, the privilege and duty of every believer, to "cast all his cares and burdens upon the Lord," "to take no anxious care for to-morrow; to rest satisfied that "the Lord will provide," and to remember that "he hath said, I will never leave thee nor forsake thee." "Having food and raiment, let us therewith be content;" and go on with the duty of our station, without any more solicitude than the child feels, who when learning his lesson, or obeying the command of his parents, cheerfully leaves them to provide him food and raiment, and does not encumber his mind with any cares about such matters.

The believer is indeed allowed and required to expect a peculiar providential interposition in all things; he is instructed that not a sparrow falls to the ground without the appointment of his Father, and that "the very hairs of his head are all numbered." He should consider the place of his abode as determined, and guarded by the Lord; and recollect that the holy angels are employed to minister to his good; that he lies down and rises up, goes out and comes in, under this special protection, that no enemies can assault, no calamity befall, no dangers so much as alarm him, except by the appointment or permission of his Almighty Father, who "makes a hedge about him, and all that he has." (Job. i. 10. ii. 3—7.) So that no famines, earthquakes, pestilences, fires, wars, massacres, persecutions, or other dreaded catastrophe, can hurt, or should alarm him; for he is safe, and shall be guided, supported, and guarded in all places and circumstances, till the appointed period of his pilgrimage arrive: and then he will be conveyed home to his Father's house, in the best way which infinite Wisdom and everlasting Love can devise. Thus "godliness is profitable for all things, having the promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come*."

V. Communion with God is the believer's privilege. We "have boldness to enter into the holiest through the blood of Jesus," and to "come boldly to the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find help in every time of need." (Heb. iv. 16. x. 19—22.) We are directed to ask what we will, and assured that it shall be given us; for "the prayer of the upright is the Lord's delight." (Prov. xv. 8. Mark. xi. 24. Luke xi. 5—13. John xiv. 13, 14. xv. 7. 16. xvi. 23, 24. Jam. i. 5. 1 John iii. 21, 22. v. 14, 15.) So that we may come, with humble confidence into the immediate presence of our reconciled Father, upon a mercy-seat, whenever we will; we may present whatever petitions our wants and circumstances suggest; we may multiply, repeat, and enforce them with all importunity and earnestness; we may urge every plea, and use all freedom; we may be assured of a cordial welcome in so doing; and we may confidently expect, that all our petitions will be answered and exceeded, in that sense and way, which most conduce to our real good. (Eph. iii. 20.) Thus we speak to our gracious God, in prayers, supplications, praises, and thanksgivings, notwithstanding that we are “but sinful dust and ashes :” (Gen. xviii. 23—33.) and our condescending Father speaks to us by his word, counselling, warning, instructing, encouraging, or reproofing us, and thus showing us the way in which we should walk, and the thing that we should do ; he evinces his regard to us by answering our prayers, and manifesting his care of us in numerous instances ; he discovers his glorious perfections to us, and gracious presence with us, and “causes his goodness to pass before us ;” and he gives us, sometimes even in deep affliction, “a peace of God, which passeth all understanding, keeping our hearts and minds by Christ Jesus.” For “truly our fellowship is with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ,” whatever men may think or say of such pretensions : and this happy experience essentially differs from the unscriptural presumption of enthusiasts and hypocrites ; though strangers to such joys do and will confound them together. (1 John i. 3.) Thus the believer, having returned to God, walks with him in his ordinances, commandments, and providential dispensations ; tastes his love in every comfort, submits to his wise and fatherly corrections in every cross, and deems it his privilege to refer every thing to his will and glory : and the Lord walks with him as his Companion, Guard, and Guide through life, is with him in the valley of the shadow of death, and then takes him home to his more immediate presence. (Gen. v. 24.)

VI. The believer experiences the consolations of the Holy Spirit, in proportion to his faith, simplicity, diligence, and watchfulness. This holy Comforter, (who dwells in every believer as in a temple that he hath consecrated to himself,) irradiates the mind by his sacred influences, to see the things that belong to the person, love, and salvation of Christ ; “and to know the blessings that are freely given him of God.” (John xvi. 15, 16. 1 Cor.

ii. 11, 12. Eph. i. 17. 18.) He assists the memory in recollecting the words of the Saviour : and he invigorates faith, causes hope to abound, enlivens the mind with love and gratitude, and thus communicates a satisfying and sanctifying joy, the earnest and pledge of heavenly felicity. This counterbalances all outward trials, dissipates sorrow, fortifies the soul against temptation, reconciles it to suffering and self-denial, and animates it for every service. It is the privilege of the believer exclusively to experience, relish, and value such joys ; and to distinguish them from the joy of the hypocrite, which springs from ignorance, pride, and presumption : we are, therefore, exhorted “ to rejoice in the Lord always ; ” and all our enfeebling dejection and sorrow are the consequences of living below our privilege, and coming short of our duty, in this as well as in other respects. Especially we forfeit and mar this joy, when we grieve the Spirit by our misconduct, or quench his holy influences by cleaving to the world, or by inexpedient self indulgence : (Eph. iv. 30. 1 Thess. v. 19.) so that the Apostle exhorts Christians, “ not to be drunk with wine wherein is excess,” (from which others seek exhilaration, and relief in trouble,) “ but to be filled with the Spirit.” (Eph. v. 18.)

VII. It is the believer's privilege “ to be kept by the power of God, through faith unto salvation,” (1 Pet. i. v.) The actual comfort of this privilege must indeed depend on our Scriptural evidence that we are true believers ; as other men can persevere in nothing except either ungodliness or hypocrisy. So long, therefore, as a man doubts whether he be indeed regenerate, he cannot take the comfort of God's promises ; for he cannot know that they belong to him ; and whatever tends to bring his character into suspicion, must proportionally interrupt his confident hope of final victory and triumph ; which is only intended to encourage the valiant soldier, when strenuously resisting his enemies, and “ fighting the good fight of faith.” The words of our Lord, however, are decisive on the point in question. “ My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me ; and I give unto them eternal life ; and they shall never perish ; neither shall any one pluck them out of my hand. My Father which gave them me, is greater than all, and no one (οὐδεις) is able to pluck them out of my Father's hand. I and my Father are One." "The water that I shall give him, shall be in him a well of water springing up unto everlasting life." "Fear not, little flock, for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom," (Luke xii. 32. John iv. 14. x. 27—30.) The Apostle assures us, that nothing shall ever separate believers from the love of God "in Christ," (Rom. viii. 35—39.) and enumerates a variety of those particulars, which principally endanger them, in the most energetic and triumphant language, in confirmation of his doctrine. The Lord hath "made with them an everlasting covenant," and hath engaged, that "he will not turn away from them to do them good ; and that he will put his fear into their hearts, that they shall not depart from him," (2 Sam. xxiii. 5. Jer. xxxii. 38—40. Ps. ciii. 17. Is. liv. 9, 10. 17.) and this covenant he hath ratified with an oath for the strong consolation of the heirs of promise ; even the oath, which he sware to Abraham, that in blessing, he would bless him, notwithstanding all possible obstructions and objections, (Heb. vi. 16—18.) Indeed, "having chosen them in Christ before the foundation of the world, and quickened them by his grace when dead in sin ;" it might reasonably be expected, that the same sovereign and everlasting mercy, would influence him to keep them to complete salvation by strength proportioned to all their trials and temptations.

We might likewise mention as separate privileges the assurance "that all things work together for good to them that love God," and combine to promote their everlasting advantage, however painful or humiliating for the present ; so that they are more than conquerors over every enemy, and enriched by all their assaults ; that death is their friend, and his dreadful stroke proves their greatest gain, (Rom. viii. 28—31. 1 Cor. xv. 55—58.) and that the EVERLAST-

ING GOD IS THEIR PORTION, and their all-sufficient and all-satisfying felicity.

But here silent contemplation best becomes us; and with this we will close these hints on a subject that is nearly inexhaustible. Enough has been said to show, that true wisdom consists in leaving, venturing, or suffering, any thing to secure such advantages; and in giving diligence to possess the assurance that they belong to us; that, if we lived up to our privileges, "the joy of the Lord would be our strength" for every service; and our cheerfulness and conscientiousness would concur in "adorning the doctrine of God our Saviour:" and that our dejections arise not from our religion; but from our want of more faith, hope, love, and all those things in which true godliness consists.

ESSAY XVIII.

On the Dispositions, and Character, peculiar to the True Believer.

WHEN our Lord concluded his pathetic exhortations to his disconsolate disciples, just before his crucifixion, by a comprehensive prayer for them; he made this one of his petitions to the Father in their behalf: "Sanctify them through thy truth; thy word is truth," (John xvii. 17.) and the Scriptures always represent divine truth, as the seed in the believer's heart of every holy disposition; the graft through which "the tree is made good, and its fruit good;" and the mould into which the soul is cast, and from which it receives its form and exact impression, as the metal is fashioned by the artist's skill, (Rom. vi. 17.) So that we are not only "justified by faith," but also "sanctified by faith," (Acts xxvi. 18.) The doctrine of Christ dwells in the regenerate soul, as an operative transforming principle, producing a peculiar state of the judgment, dispositions, and affections, in proportion to the degree in which it is understood and believed. This may properly be called the Christian temper. It is the exact counterpart of the truths by which it is produced ; it discriminates the real believer from all other men ; and it constitutes the standard of our proficiency in vital godliness, of our “ growth in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.” Alas ! a great part of the acquaintance that most of us have formed with the truths of Revelation is merely notional ; and if we do not perceive the genuine nature and tendency of the doctrines to which we assent ; they must fail to exert their transforming efficacy upon our hearts. Thus “ knowledge puffeth up,” even when the things known are evidently suited to produce the deepest humility ; and though they never fail to have this effect, where they are received by a living faith as the nutriment and medicine of the soul. It may, therefore, be proper to consider more particularly those dispositions and affections of the mind, which constitute the appropriate temper and character of the true believer ; adverting, as we proceed, to those truths by which they are produced and nourished ; and endeavouring to distinguish between the lamented failures and imperfections of the upright, and the allowed and indulged evils of the mere hypocrite or self-deceiver.

I. Then, Humility may be considered as most essential to the Christian temper, and as radical to every other part of it. The believer’s principles continually present before his mind the greatness and majesty of God, and the comparative meanness of all creatures ; which cannot fail to abate his natural propensity to self-importance and self-exaltation, and to make him feel himself to be as nothing before the infinite Creator. Having received his being, and all he is and possesses, from the hand of the Lord, and holding every thing in the most absolute dependence on him ; he cannot consistently “ glory as though he had not received them.” He knows that every benefit lays him under obligation ; that every talent demands a proportionable improvement ; and that he must shortly be turned out of his stewardship, and required to give an account of it ; and he is conscious, that he has not made suitable returns to his Benefactor, or due improvement of his talents. This teaches him, that all those things of which he has been tempted to be proud, ought to cover him with shame, and increase his humility ; for they have all proved occasions of additional transgressions, and thus call upon him to repent, and deprecate the wrath of his offended Benefactor.

His principles also lead him to compare his conduct with the perfect law of God, and not with the examples and maxims of this sinful world ; and to condemn every deviation from that strict and spiritual rule, even in thought or inclination, as sin, and as deserving the Lord's displeasure and abhorrence ; so that every part of his past and present behaviour suggests to him reasons for self-abasement ; for sin mixes with, and defiles even his best duties, and he feels his need of repentance, of mercy, and of the atoning blood, in every action of his life. He is deeply convinced that " it is of the Lord's mercies he is not consumed ;" all his hopes of acceptance and happiness spring from faith in the Lamb of God, and in his expiatory sacrifice ; and he receives every comfort, not only as the gift of the Lord's bounty, but as purchased by his Redeemer for an hell-deserving sinner ; and how can he, who lives under the influence of these principles, be proud of his possessions or attainments ? He dares not venture even to the mercy-seat of his forgiving God, except in the name of his beloved Son ; and he deems it a precious favour that he may be allowed thus to pray for mercy and salvation. Indeed, he cannot, in general, but perceive that he differs from ungodly men, and from himself in former years ; but he knows that this difference is the effect of a divine influence on his mind ; so that he sees abundant reason for thankfulness on this account, but none for pride and self-complacency. Nay, he is sensible that he hath been kept from gross immoralities, through which numbers are made equally mischievous and wretched, by a divine interposition, in various ways restraining him from listening to temptation, or following the devices of his own heart: so that his preservation from the most destructive enormities is rather an occasion for gratitude, than for self-preference; whilst his misconduct in less scandalous instances seems to him to be baser, when compared with his advantages, than the crimes of the unhappy outcasts from human society.

As he frequently and carefully views himself in the glass of the holy law, and diligently compares his whole behaviour with the perfect example of Christ; as he attentively considers his obligations and opportunities, and examines strictly his motives, affections, thoughts, words, and works; as he is severe in judging himself, and candid in estimating the conduct of his brethren; so he is unavoidably led, in his best hours, to "esteem others better than himself," and "in honour to prefer them." (Rom. xii. 10. Phil. ii. 3.) Thus he is habitually disposed to take the lowest place; instead of ambitiously aspiring to pre-eminence, which always results from the want of consistency with evangelical principles. He is also accustomed to entertain a deep sense of his own ignorance, and proneness to mistake; for his experience and observation confirm the declarations of Scripture in this respect; hence originates a teachable disposition; a willingness to "receive the kingdom of God as a little child," and "to become a fool," in order to obtain true wisdom. The most eminent saints have, therefore, always most sensibly felt, and frankly owned their want of wisdom; and been most ready to ask it of God, (Jam. i. 5.) and to inquire his will at every step, with the greatest simplicity and fervency. And though the well instructed believer will not call any man father upon earth, or implicitly adopt all the instructions of any uninspired person, but will bring every opinion and counsel to the touchstone of God's word; yet he will be always learning, even from his inferiors, his enemies, or false accusers; being glad of a little additional light on his path from any quarter. And whilst he considers the written word as the complete rule of truth and duty, and decidedly rejects both the traditions of men, and the effusions of enthusiasm, he will ever feel his need of divine teaching, to prepare his mind for receiving and using the light of revelation, whatever means he employ in order to understand it; and will continue a learner to the end of his days, as his only security against the artifices of Satan, and the devices of false teachers.

In like manner the consistent Christian is humbly sensible of his own weakness; and, when actually influenced by his principles, he will not dare to say, "though all men deny thee, yet will not I;" but rather, "hold thou me up, and I shall be safe;" "lead me not into temptation;" "hold up my goings in thy ways, that my footsteps slip not." Experience hath convinced him, "that when he is weak, then is he strong;" and that, "when he thinks he stands," he has most cause to "take heed lest he should fall;" so that he is conscious, he has no power in himself, either to resist temptations, endure tribulations, face dangers, or perform duties; and that he can only "be strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might." (2 Cor. xii. 9, 10. Eph. vi. 10. Phil. iv. 13.) Thus simplicity of dependance on God for teaching, assistance, protection, forgiveness, acceptance, sanctification, final perseverance, and complete salvation, are produced and maintained: the believer becomes more and more poor in spirit, and a constant pensioner on the Lord, in all circumstances, and on all occasions.—Indeed, even this peculiarity of the true believer partakes of that imperfection, which pervades his whole character; and he often betrays, and is humbled for the pride of his heart, and continually laments his proneness to self-exaltation; yet, all "boasting is" habitually "excluded," from his heart and lips; with self-preference, self-admiration, and contempt of others. In short all the varied workings of ambition, arrogance, insolence, vain glory, and envy, with the numerous evils of which pride is the prolific parent, are opposed, hated, mortified, and crucified; and a lowly, self-abased, contrite, and submissive spirit is gradually formed, both in respect of God, and his brethren and neighbours. Every part of the Christian temper and character depends on this, and springs from it as from its proper root: and that person is not much conversant in the Scriptures, who has not observed, that more is there spoken in approbation of this disposition of mind, and that more encouraging promises are made to it, than any other part of that "holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord;" for, "He resisteth the proud, and giveth his grace to the humble*." All notions, gifts, and experiences, therefore, which consist with allowed, prevailing, and habitual pride, ambition, self-exaltation, boasting, and contempt of others, are radically defective; and give cause to suspect that they are wholly detached from the power of godliness, and the special grace of the regenerating Spirit of Christ, however splendid they may appear in the eyes of superficial observers.

II. Another essential branch of the Christian temper may be comprised in the word submission. "Submit yourselves to God," says the Apostle; and that view of the divine perfections, law, government, and grace, which springs from evangelical principles, tends to counteract and crucify the self-will, and desire of independence, which predominate in our fallen nature, and are the source of all our rebellion against our Maker. This submission is diametrically opposite to the disposition of men in general; and in its full extent cannot be produced by any other principles than those of the Holy Scriptures. The efficacy of divine truth upon the believing mind tends to produce a willingness to submit the understanding to the teaching of God: and instead of hankering after the forbidden fruit of the tree of knowledge, or counting it more pleasant to discover matters for ourselves by the sufficiency of our own powers; it leads us to submit as the scholar to his tutor, to believe what the Lord testifies, and to rest satisfied with it; leaving secret things which belong to him, and thankfully using revealed things as the "light of our feet, and the lantern of our paths." The same principles tend to produce submission to the will and authority of God, deeming his service perfect freedom, his commandments not grievous, his yoke easy, and his ways the paths of peace and pleasantness. Submission to his righteousness springs from the same source; and the man, who truly believes the word of God, will gradually become more and more unreserved in allowing his justice in the sentence of condemnation which he hath passed upon sinners in general, and upon him in particular. In consequence of this he will also submit to his sovereign wisdom and righteousness, in the appointed method of saving sinners, and in all things relating to it: whilst unbelief proportionably vents itself in objections, which involve the most daring blasphemy. This will connect with submission to God, in respect of his instituted ordinances, as means of grace appointed by him, to be made efficacious by his blessing; and as acts of worship, by which we are required to render him in a measure the honour due to his name. And, finally, the same principles tend to produce habitual submission to his providence, in respect of our outward situation and provision; and of those appointments and regulations by which he hath been pleased to restrain vice, and to promote peace and good order in human society; "giving honour to whom honour is due," "and submitting to every ordinance of man, for the Lord's sake."—This submission is a duty of vast extent: and the disposition habitually to aim at it, and when we have failed, to return to it in every particular, is peculiar to those who are born of God; while all the opposition of our hearts to it arises from the remaining pride and self-will of our fallen nature, and is a proof that we have not hitherto been fully influenced by our principles.

But patience, resignation, contentment, and acquiescence in the will of God respecting us, constitute so important a part of the Christian temper, that they require a more particular consideration: and, when genuine, they are so invariably connected with submission to God in all other respects, that, wherever any appearances of them are found wholly separated from it, we may be sure they are mere counterfeits, the result of natural insensibility, affected apathy, thoughtless indolence, or presumptuous obduracy. Evangelical principles so effectually inculcate the doctrine of our total unworthiness, and that we all enjoy more than we deserve, and suffer less than what is due to our sins; that, as far as we are influenced by them, they must silence our rebellious murmurs and repinings against God. They lead us likewise so entirely to trace every event to his appointment, as the first cause of all our trials; that they tend directly to counteract our propensity to despise his chastenings, or to vent our uneasiness under trouble in expressions of anger against instruments and second causes. They give us such a ground for confidence in the mercy, truth, power, and love of God, and for the animating hope of future happiness, as suffice to support the soul, and to preserve us from fainting or desponding under divine rebukes; whilst the persuasion that infinite wisdom and everlasting love have chosen, and will overrule, every event for our more important good, is suited to produce a rational, reflecting and abiding acquiescence in the will of our heavenly Father. The Lord hath many wise and kind reasons for allotting his people those things, which they would never have chosen for themselves; and if they knew the whole intent of his most painful dispensations, they would certainly approve of them; for every affliction is medicinal to the soul, and conducive to its sanctification. Thus the Christian's principles lead him to consider his station, abode, employment, provision, trials, losses, disappointments, and vexations, as the will of God concerning him: and this induces him to acquiesce in them. He "learns" in the school of Christ, "in whatever state he is, therewith to be content;" and, as far as he acts consistently with his judgment, he views every dispensation in a favourable light, and realizes the paradox, "sorrowful yet always rejoicing." He seeks comfort from God when other comforts are withdrawn: and he is taught to wait the Lord's time for deliverance, by "patient continuance in well doing;" without using any sinful expedients, or deserting his path or work to escape the cross. He looks for trouble as long as he continues on earth: he esteems sin to be a greater evil than affliction: and in the character, sufferings, patience, and glory of his divine Saviour, he finds every instruction explained, and every argument enforced, by which resignation, confidence in God, and joy in tribulations, are inculcated. Indeed, in this, as in all other respects, the believer is conscious that he comes far short of his perfect rule and example; and this covers him with shame, and excites his earnest prayers for mercy and grace: but his views tend to render him cheerful at all times, and in all circumstances; as they give the fullest assurance, that every event will conduce to the final and eternal good of all who love God; so that all the discouragement, despondency, and disquietude of religious people, spring from other causes, and are directly contrary to their principles. An humble confidence in God, in respect of the future, is also of great importance: but this hath been particularly considered as one of the believer's privileges*, and need not further be discussed in this place: for indeed our duties and our privileges are seldom more distinct, than the same object viewed in different lights, or the same idea expressed by different terms.

III. The fear of God is another branch of the Christian temper, which evidently results from the principles of revelation. There is indeed a slavish fear which hath torment, and which is cast out by holy love as far as it prevails, (1 John iv. 18.) but we here speak of that reverential fear of the divine majesty, authority, holiness, and glory, which produces solemn awe, humble adoration, and a serious reflecting frame of mind; which leads a man habitually to act as in the presence of the all-seeing and heart-searching God, and influences him to universal conscientiousness, even in his most secret actions, and in respect of his inmost thoughts ; which teaches him to regard with profound veneration the name, word, works, counsels, decrees, and judgments of the Lord ; which helps to constitute the upright, spiritual worshipper in all his ordinances, and which induces the believer to fear the frown, and desire the favour of God above all other things. This “ fear of God,” is the effect of special grace, grows in harmony with holy love, and will be perfected with it, when the Christian shall join the company and worship of Seraphim before the throne, (Ps. lxxxix. 7. Is. vi. 1—8. Heb. xii. 28.) Every truth of revelation concurs in giving us those views of God, and of ourselves, that are suited to produce this reverential spirit ; the total want of it, therefore, must evince that the high affections of many persons are false, and their overbearing confidence unwarranted ; and that man must be very imperfectly acquainted with evangelical principles, or but partially influenced by them, who is greatly deficient in it.

IV. The love of God is essential to the Christian temper ; but it must be very briefly discussed in this place ; as in many things it coincides with the first table of the law which hath been already explained, (Essay iv.) The truths of the gospel, when received by living faith into the regenerate heart, are wonderfully suited to excite and increase admiring love of the divine perfections, as displayed in all the works of God ; but especially in that of redemption by Jesus Christ ; hence arise fervent desires after that felicity, which is found in contemplating his glory, and enjoying his love. The soul begins “ to be athirst for God ;” and in proportion to the prevalence of this holy affection for the Supreme Good, all inferior objects lose their attractions ; so that when the believer fears, lest he should not obtain the happiness of the beatific vision, but should at last be banished from the presence of God, he can take no pleasure in worldly prosperity ; when his communion with the Lord is interrupted, all other joys seem insipid ; but the light of his countenance gilds every object, alleviates every trouble, and enhances every comfort. Lively gratitude, for mercies inestimable, inexpressible, and unmerited, keeps pace with his hope of acceptance; and he cannot but most earnestly inquire, "what he shall render to the Lord for all his benefits?" The same views produce zeal for the glory of God, and the honour of the gospel; and the believer is habitually disposed to consider what effect his conduct may have on the minds of men in this respect; whence humiliation, circumspection, and care to improve his talents, must always arise. In all these affections and dispositions, there will be a particular regard to the person of Christ, as One with the Father and the divine spirit, and the equal Object of all love, confidence, honour, gratitude, and adoration, (Essays vi. vii. xiii.) and an habitual disposition to meditate on his sufferings and love, to rejoice in his exaltation, and in the success of his gospel; and to desire that his name should every where be known, trusted, and loved, and that his people should prosper and be happy. 'This love of Christ is the grand constraining principle of all evangelical obedience and devoted subjection to him who bought us with his blood; and the several dispositions towards God, which have been enumerated, constitute the spirit of adoption; for when we have in this manner the temper of children towards God, the Holy Spirit bears witness, according to the Scripture, that he is our Father, and that we are his sons and daughters, the regenerate and adopted heirs of his heavenly inheritance.

V. The true believer is spiritually minded; that is, he is disposed to seek his happiness in spiritual things, because he is capable of relishing and delighting in them. Other men may have a task of religion; but the world is their element, in which they live as much as their consciences will allow them: whereas, the believer "has tasted that the Lord is gracious;" "he remembers his love more than wine;" "his soul has been satisfied, as with marrow and fatness, whilst he praised the Lord with joyful lips." In proportion, therefore, as he acts consistently with his principles; he either finds joy and pleasure in communion with God, and in doing his will, or he mourns after him. He feels that he must be miserable, unless "God his exceeding joy" vouchsafe to make him happy; he separates from many companies and pursuits, to spend his time in the closet, in the house of God, or in the communion of the saints; not only from a sense of duty, but in order to enjoy his most valued pleasures, and to avoid whatever may interrupt them; and when he cannot find comfort in this way, and is tempted to seek it in the world, he is ready to say, "Lord, to whom shall I go? thou hast the words of eternal life." This is an essential part of the Christian temper; all attachment to worldly trifles, arises from our not being duly influenced by our principles; and as far as we act consistently, we shall attend to the lawful concerns, and use the allowed comforts of life, in a sanctified and holy manner.

But a very copious subject yet remains; the temper of the believer towards his brethren and neighbours, is equally worthy of our attention. Many things indeed, which might be here adduced, will occur to us, when relative duties come under consideration. It is, however, too copious and important a topic to be comprised in a very small compass: it will therefore be more expedient to annex a second part of this Essay, and to conclude at present with some brief observations on what hath been said.

1. Then every attentive and impartial reader must perceive, even from this imperfect sketch, that revelation is principally intended to lead men to proper thoughts of God, and suitable dispositions and affections towards him. They, who suppose the moral precepts, which relate to the conduct of men towards one another, to be the most important and valuable part of Scripture; certainly mistake the leading intent of it; for godliness, (or a disposition to behave towards God, according to the glory of his perfections, and our relations and obligations to him,) is the first object both in the commandments of the law, and in the doctrines and promises of the gospel; and the sins, against which the Lord always expresses the most vehement indignation, (such as Atheism, Idolatry, Apostasy, Unbelief, Enmity against him, Contempt and Forgetfulness of him, Profaneness, and Blasphemy,) may be habitually committed by men of good moral character, who are honest, sincere, benevolent, temperate, or peaceable, from selfish principles. These things, however, will not excuse the hatred and neglect of their infinitely glorious Creator and Benefactor. Indeed, a man cannot be godly who is not moral; because we are required to express our regard to God, by behaving well to our brethren and neighbours.

2. The principal value even of divine truth, consists in its sanctifying efficacy on the minds of believers. Many "imprison the truth in unrighteousness;" even the doctrines of the gospel are often professed and contended for with such arrogance, irreverence, and fierceness, that it is plain they are not principles in the heart meliorating the disposition; but mere notions in the understanding, serving as an occasion of gratifying malignant passions, advancing worldly interests, or rendering a man conspicuous amongst his neighbours; and sensible men, observing this, imbibe strong and fatal prejudices against the truth, through the manifest misconduct of such advocates for it.

3. Even the smallest degree, in which the doctrines of the gospel operate as principles transforming the soul into their holy nature, suffices indeed to prove that they have been received with a measure of living faith; yet the Lord hath so arranged his plan, that various circumstances concur, in preventing the believer from deriving a strong scriptural assurance from a feeble effect of truth upon his mind. But in proportion as our principles induce us habitually to "exercise ourselves unto godliness," the certainty of the change becomes evident; our faith is proved to be living, and to work by love, and the Holy Spirit thus witnesses with our spirits that we are the children of God; yet this generally connects with deep humiliation, in respect of the small degree in which we are sanctified.

4. Finally, our rule is perfect, and grace teaches us to aim at perfection; but we are still in a state of warfare and imperfection, in which "repentance towards God, and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ," will continue to be necessary. "Blessed," then, "are they, who hunger and thirst after righteousness; for they," and they only, "shall be eternally satisfied."

ESSAY XIX.

IN stating with brevity, yet with some degree of precision, the peculiarities of the Christian temper and character, as produced by the seed of divine truth received into the heart by living faith, we shall sometimes be led to deduce coincident parts of them from different principles; some things therefore which were touched upon in the former Essay, may be here again resumed in another connexion. This will especially be perceived in relation to that subject, with which I shall introduce the delineation of the Christian temper, as it more particularly respects our brethren and neighbours, viz.

I. Indifference to the world, and the things of the world, (1 John ii. 15—17.) Patience, contentment, gratitude, and cheerfulness have been shown to be the genuine effect of that confidence in God and submission to his will, which arise from a real belief of the doctrines contained in the Holy Scriptures; but they receive a collateral support also from just views of the vanity of all earthly things, and the importance of eternity; whilst these are likewise essential to a proper frame of mind, and tenor of conduct towards our neighbours. For what is most productive of immorality and mischief among mankind? Does not an inordinate eagerness in the pursuit of worldly objects, occasion a vast proportion of the crimes and miseries that fill the earth? This has not only led men idolatrously to forsake, and wilfully to rebel against God; but it has also prompted them to become the oppressors and murderers of each other, in every age and nation ; and thus to fill the earth with “ lamentation, and mourning, and wo !” Nor can it reasonably be expected that any effectual remedy will ever be applied to these evils ; unless men can be generally convinced, that the objects of their fierce contentions are mere “ vanity and vexation of spirit,” and that nobler blessings are attainable. This has been so obvious to men of reflection, that many sects of philosophers, and the inventors of various superstitions, have in this respect manifestly proposed the same end as Christianity does ; but the means have been so injudicious and inadequate, that they have only taught men to sacrifice one lust to another ; and to deny sensuality or avarice, that they might more advantageously gratify the lust of dominion, or thirst for the applause of men.

But when the Apostle exclaimed, “ God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ ;” he subjoined, “ by whom the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world,” (Gal. vi. 14.) The world and every thing in it ; even the “ lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye and the pride of life ;” and whatever was suited to gratify the appetites, the senses, the avarice, the ambition, or vain-glory of man, seemed to him no more attractive, than the distorted defiled countenance of a crucified malefactor ; while he was also entirely willing to be looked upon by all worldly men, with that contempt, pity, or aversion which such an object is suited to inspire. Indeed, the doctrines that relate to the incarnation of Christ, the birth of Emmanuel in a stable, his obscure education and life of labour till he entered on his public ministry ; his subsequent poverty, hardship, reproach, and suffering, till he expired a sinless sacrifice on the cross ; together with the circumstances of his followers, and the treatment they met with, are directly suited to mortify every corrupt affection of the human heart, and to create an indifference about all those objects which unbelievers idolize. The doctrine of the cross, when spiritually understood, gives us such a view of the deplorable condition into which sin hath plunged our species, and of the hopeless misery to which the most prosperous ungodly man is every moment exposed; as must tend to lower all earthly distinctions in the believer's estimation; and to break the fatal association in his mind, between the idea of happiness, and that of worldly prosperity; for he cannot but see, that a confluence of all earthly comforts, avail not to preserve the possessor from death and hell, nor even to keep out the dread of them. That near view likewise, which faith presents to the mind, of the reality and speedy approach of an eternal and unchangeable state, cannot but damp his ardour, and abate his assiduity, in pursuing those things which must so soon be left for ever; whilst the substantial possessions, the incorruptible honours, and the unalloyed pleasures, which are proposed to his hope, tend to draw off his affections from "things on the earth," and to fix them "on things above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God," (2 Cor. iv. 18. Col. iii. 1—4.) For as this globe appears to us who live on its surface, to be very unequal by the interchange of mountains and valleys; yet could we rise above it and view these at a distance, such inequalities would appear inconsiderable compared with its vast magnitude; and as we looked down upon it from a still greater and greater distance, they would by degrees entirely vanish from our sight; so, to the carnal mind, the difference between rich and poor, prince and beggar, seems immense; but in proportion as our judgment and affections become spiritual, the disparity diminishes, till the distinction seems wholly to disappear. All are *sinner*s and *mortal*s; all must stand before the impartial tribunal of God; all are under condemnation according to the law; all are invited to accept of the salvation of the gospel; and all must be eternally happy or miserable, as they are found in the company of believers or of unbelievers. Thus indifference to the world, and its honours, friendship, wealth, decorations, pomp, splendour, and indulgences, whether of the senses, the appetites, or the passions of the mind, is the genuine result of evangelical principles; it is uniformly proportioned to the degree in which we are really influenced by them ; and every tendency to covetousness, ambition, or vain-glory ; and all dissatisfaction with a mean or precarious provision, or the desire of things more ornamental, elegant, fashionable, or indulgent than those which providence hath allotted to us, is a proof that we are not fully cast into the mould of the truths which we profess. A Christian is a stranger and pilgrim upon earth ; he wants accommodation during his abode in this foreign land, and his journey to his heavenly home ; and he cannot but prefer things pleasant to those that are painful ; yet this is not his object, nor can he consistently loiter, turn aside, or disquiet himself about such matters ; much less can he seek great things, by disobeying his Lord, clouding his own prospects, disgracing his character, or interrupting his comforts. There is, indeed, a certain place assigned to him in society ; and perhaps he cannot fill his place with propriety, without many externals which are of little value, and which many of his brethren have not : but he cannot, consistently, glory or rejoice in them, or prefer himself to others on that account ; nay, he will rather deem them snares and encumbrances, which may retard his course and seduce him into conformity to the world. His duty may also call him to fill up a superior situation in society, and to possess authority or wealth, as the steward of God for the good of others ; or he may be engaged in any lawful business ; but his principles will prevent him from loving the world, and teach him moderation both in the pursuit of apparent advantages, and in the use of his possessions ; they will dispose him to abstain from many things which others in similar situations seize upon, or indulge in, to shun what others deem desirable ; and to consider the concessions, which he makes to the customs of society, rather as a cross, than as a satisfaction. Christianity, indeed, is very far from confounding the different ranks and orders in the community : nor does it at all countenance self-invented austerities, or a morose rejection of the rational comforts and satisfac-

tions of life ; for “ the Lord hath given us all things richly to enjoy : ” but it teaches us to “ be satisfied with such things as we have, ” if these be merely “ food and raiment, ” though the meanest and most scanty ; to refrain from every thing inexpedient, as well as from whatever is unlawful ; and not to put any interest or indulgence in competition with the peace and comfort of our weakest brother. It instructs us not to consider any earthly distinction, as our riches, adorning, honour, or pleasure, but to use all things as strangers that are about to leave them ; to do all as the Lord’s servants, and to improve every advantage as his stewards ; and thus “ whether we eat or drink, or whatever we do, to do all to the glory of God. ” Whenever these ends require it, we are called upon to deny ourselves, to forsake all, to act as if we hated our dearest relatives, to part with every earthly possession, to take up our cross, and even lay down our lives for the sake of him who died for us and rose again : and he hath expressly declared, that without this disposition, purpose, and conduct, we cannot be his disciples ; and hath given motives and assurances sufficient to encourage us to make all these sacrifices with cheerfulness ; ” (Matt. xvi. 24—26. xix. 29. Luke xiv. 25—33. 1 Cor. viii. 12, 13. x. 31. Heb. xiii. 5, 6.) “ Seek ye first, ” says he, “ the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you : ” (Mat. vi. 31—34. Luke xii. 28—32.) and he hath given us a warrant to trust him in the path of duty, both in respect of ourselves and of all that belong to us.

Our principles likewise teach us to consider this world as a barren land and a scene of trouble, and to expect no rest in it ; to take matters as we find them, (except as the duty of our station may be concerned,) and not to be anxious about our condition, though we be poor, or even slaves ; because “ the fashion of this world passeth away. ” (1 Cor. vii. 21—23. 29—31.) All discontent in obscure and indigent circumstances, as well as insolence in prosperity, all envy of the rich or renowned, all coveting or hankering after somewhat greater, easier, or more abundant; all eagerness in pursuing and seeking after worldly advantages, all sanguine expectations of those changes, by which carnal men fancy that the blanks of this world's lottery may become prizes; all inclination to spend more than we can afford in things not absolutely necessary, or to appear above our rank in our raiment, habitations, furniture, or tables, and to incur debts by thus emulating our superiors; all that shame which we are apt to feel at the discovery even of honest frugal poverty; all our reluctance to leave our children to earn their bread by menial labour, if the Lord be pleased so to appoint it; and a great many other things which we witness around us, and may be conscious of in ourselves, are manifest deviations from the spirit of Christianity, inconsistent with the principles of the gospel, and productive of very many evil consequences. It does not, indeed, follow, that such persons, as manifest a degree of these carnal propensities, are insincere in their profession; but it proves that they have but partially understood the tendency, and experienced the efficacy of the truth. And if any who contend for evangelical doctrines, are wholly strangers to this "crucifixion to the world," and treat such subjects as low and legal; without doubt their faith is dead, and their hope presumptuous; for all true Christians lament and mourn, that they are no more mortified to the world, and indifferent about its perishing trifles.

II. Benevolence, or philanthropy, is an eminent branch of the Christian temper. The law of "loving our neighbour as ourselves," is written in the heart of every regenerate person; and it is constantly referred to in the New-Testament as the believer's rule of conduct towards all men. Our Lord has beautifully illustrated its extensive meaning, in the parable or narrative of the good Samaritan; and he exemplified it in his beneficent life, and by dying for us, when we were strangers and enemies. Every man, of whatever nation, complexion, or religion he may be, is our neighbour, whom we are commanded to love as ourselves, and to whom we are to act as we would he should act towards us; and this is the substance of the second table of the law. (Essay iv.) The truths of the gospel also, respecting the worth of immortal souls, the ruined state of the whole human species, the sovereignty and freeness of divine grace, the infinite insufficiency of the redemption of Christ, the love of the Father in sending his Son to be the Saviour of the world, the love of the Son in dying for us, the love of the Spirit in quickening us when dead in sin, the possibility of the greatest persecutor being made partaker of the same grace; as well as the precepts of our Lord, who enforced the spiritual duties of the law on his disciples by evangelical motives; must influence every one who experiences their transforming energy, to love his neighbour unfeignedly, and to aspire after a more perfect conformity to the holy commandment, and the attractive example of his gracious Saviour. These principles tend to enlarge the heart in good-will to men; to soften it into compassion; to subdue envy, enmity, and resentment; and to kindle an ardent desire after the present and future happiness of the human species, however distinguished and separated, or whatever their character and conduct towards us may be. This general disposition to "love our neighbour as ourselves," and to regulate that love according to the rules of God's word, comprehends all the various affections which belong to the several relations of life; for these, when rational and legitimate, are only modifications of benevolence, or emanations from it, in conformity to the providential will of God, and in obedience to his commandments. In like manner, the special love of our brethren, or fellow Christians, results from the same general principle: for believers are related to each other more nearly than to any other persons; they are children of the same Father, heirs of the same inheritance, yea, members of the same body, partakers of the same divine life, and temples of the same Spirit. They are fellow-soldiers in the same

army, fellow-travellers in the same journey, and denizens of the same heavenly city. They possess also an excellency peculiar to themselves, even the image of God, and the beauty of holiness; they are the brethren and representatives of Christ, to whom we are required to show all kindness for his sake, and as if he were personally present with us: and on all accounts they are intitled, not only to our good will and compassion, but to our cordial approbation, esteem, and most endeared affection. (Gal. vi. 10.) Evangelical principles, therefore, must influence those who experience their energy, to delight in them, and to choose them as companions. (Psa. xvi. 3. cxix. 63.) This indeed is selected by the Apostle, as the sure evidence, that we “are passed from death unto life;” (1 John iii. 14.) for when we value and take pleasure in the society of those who bear the image of Christ, profess his gospel, and walk in his ways; when we find our hearts united to them in love, and enlarged in desires of promoting their welfare, not because they belong to our party, but because they belong to Christ; when our cordial affection is increased in proportion as they appear to us to bear his holy image; even though they differ from us in some sentiments or forms: it then appears that the truth dwells in us with transforming power, and that we really love the Lord himself. By nature we were disposed to dislike, shun, or neglect such persons, and even to despise and hate them: or if, on other accounts, we loved any of them, this affection might indeed make us tolerate their religious peculiarities, but it could not induce us to take pleasure in their spiritual conversation and behaviour. This love of the brethren may easily be distinguished from an attachment to those of our own party, who pleases us by coincidence of judgment, and by flattering our good opinion of ourselves; (which is only a specious modification of self-love.) For when this is all, a man will prefer the least spiritual, even of his own sect, to those that are more so; and will choose to associate with mere carnal men who agree with him in sentiment on disputed points, rather than with the most eminent believers who are of another opinion : and he will always be more ready to engage in controversy, than to hold the truth in peace and love.—From these two branches of the Christian temper, many others will result ; and indeed they cannot be proved genuine, except by their connexion with the rest.

III. A disposition to be harmless and blameless is the genuine effect of evangelical principles well understood and truly believed. Beyond dispute the world is full of misery ; and this misery, in great measure, springs from the crimes of men, not only as a punishment inflicted by divine justice, but also as a necessary effect of them. For men, following the impulse of their appetites and passions, render themselves and others wretched, and seduce one another into such courses as must end in future misery, except they be forsaken. The real Christian therefore, from regard to the happiness of others, and of himself, as well as from zeal for the glory of God, will carefully guard against every thing which tends to increase the sum total of human misery or vice ; and his moderation respecting worldly things will place him out of the reach of many temptations to which others are exposed, or else enable him to resist them. He will habitually aim to be just and honest in all his dealings ; not grasping at gains which custom may have sanctioned, but which accord not with strict probity ; not taking advantage of any man's ignorance, or necessity, to circumvent or exact from him ; not evading taxes, and leaving his neighbour to bear a disproportionate part of them ; not insisting on his utmost due, when it would distress those that owe it ; not keeping, by a continued fraud, that property which hath been unjustly obtained, when it is in his power to make restitution ; not living extravagantly, nor engaging in perilous schemes, and thus contracting needless debts to the injury of his creditors and family ; not taking his neighbour's work without wages, or oppressing the poor to increase his wealth or support his luxury ; not concurring in any plan for getting money, by methods which en-slave the persons, expose the lives, or endanger the souls of men ; not using the too customary impositions of trade, which are every where condemned in Scripture, however pleaded for by men professing to believe it ; and which substitute the rule of doing as others do to us, instead of doing as we would they should do to us. In short, he will conscientiously render to God, to Cæsar, and to all the different members of the community, their dues ; rather choosing to give up his own right, than to infringe on that of another : and though he will not in every instance come up to that exactness which he proposes ; yet his attainments will habitually accord with his knowledge of the divine word, and be proportioned to his experience of its transforming efficacy on his heart.

The same principles will influence the consistent believer to “ put away lying, and to speak truth with his neighbour ;” paying the strictest regard to veracity, sincerity, and fidelity in all his professions, conversation, narration of facts, and engagements. He cannot consistently trifle with so sacred a matter as truth, for the sake of a jest, an humorous tale, or a compliment ; much less to gratify anger, malice, or avarice ; or in flattery, slander, or religious controversy. He will aim to avoid all prevarication and equivocal expressions, and whatever has a tendency to deceive ; his “ yea will be yea, and his nay, nay :” he will study undisguised sincerity, and not, under professions of friendship, raise expectations which he hath no intention or prospect of answering : he will deem himself bound to punctuality and fidelity to all his engagements, even when they prove injurious to him ; and he will certainly fulfil them, if it be required and practicable, provided he was not deceived in the grounds on which he made them, and no command of God be violated by it. (Ps. xv. 4.)

The same disposition of leading a blameless and harmless life will influence him to those kinds and to that degree of self-denial, which are requisite in order to avoid gratifying any inclination by disturbing the peace, corrup-

ting the morals, or injuring the person of another ; or which may in any way tempt, weaken, or stumble those around him. It will equally caution him to bridle his tongue, and to abstain from all bitter, provoking, backbiting, or corrupting discourse ; and from all words, however witty and ingenious, which tend to pollute the imagination, to inflame the passions, to asperse the reputation, or disturb the domestic harmony, of any one. Nay, consistency requires him to avoid every expression that may give needless uneasiness to another ; and to refrain from repeating disadvantageous reports, though known to be true, except when it is necessary to prevent others from being deceived or injured.

In these and many other particulars, the believer's principles will influence him to "avoid all appearance of evil," when it can be done with a clear conscience ; to take care that "his good be not evil spoken of ;" to "provide things honest in the sight of all men ;" and to give no needless offence to any one. Thus he will endeavour by well-doing to put to silence false accusers, and to compel even those who hate his religion, to allow, that he is a quiet good kind of a person.—Alas, "in many things we offend all ;" but the consistent Christian will excuse none of his failures : on the contrary, when conscious of having acted improperly, he will condemn himself, even more severely than others condemn him. Let it be here also noted, that diligence in the proper business of a man's station ; without meddling with such things as do not belong to it, is an essential part of a harmless conduct ; and the consistent Christian will be very frugal and provident, and submit to many hardships, rather than burden others, or needlessly leave his family to be maintained by them. The example of Christ and his Apostles, as well as the precepts of the New Testament, show that every degree of sloth and bad management by which men are reduced to a disgraceful poverty, and led to intercept what others have a prior claim to, is inconsistent with the obligations and character of believers ; however zealous men may be for the doctrines and ordinances of religion : and surely evangelical motives should induce us to fill up our proper stations as diligently, as worldly motives do the most respectable part of ungodly men.

IV. To love mercy, and to be kind and liberal in doing good, is peculiarly the disposition and character of the true believer. The Apostle's language on this subject is very remarkable—"See that ye abound in this grace also :—ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ ; that though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor, that ye through his poverty might be rich." (1 Cor. viii. 7—9.) "Charge them that are rich in this world, that they do good, that they be rich in good works, ready to distribute, willing to communicate," (1 Tim. vi. 17—19.) But this topic, as far as the more affluent are concerned, is more fully discussed in another place, (Essay xxii.) yet even they "who labour, working with their hands, are required to give to them that need ;" and the cup of cold water, or the widow's two mites, may express a willing mind as decidedly as the largest beneficence of the wealthy. Active kindness however does not consist merely in giving ; but a man may express much love by thwarting his own inclination or foregoing his ease, that he may serve others. That charity of which the Apostle speaks so highly, (1 Cor. xiii.) is especially distinguished by its unfeigned desire and aim to promote both the temporal and eternal good of others ; and may be shown in a vast variety of unexpensive services, and in minute self-denials accompanied with alacrity and kindness. The consistent Christian, in the lowest condition, will never want an occasion of convincing his little circle, that he wishes to do them good, and is habitually ready to put himself to trouble and inconvenience for that purpose ; while he will always be able to pray for numbers to whom he can render no other service. And though the household of faith be entitled to the preference in such works and labours of love ; yet none, (no not even our bitterest enemies and persecutors,) are to be excluded from them.

V. Christian principles will induce a man, whilst thus endeavouring to do good to all and harm to none, to suffer

long, to forbear, forgive, and pursue peace with all men. The patience and long-suffering of God, though provoked continually; his exuberent kindness in plentifully supplying the wants and protecting the persons of the wicked; (Matt. v. 48—48.) and especially his forbearance towards us when we were enemies to him, and the inexpressible grace by which we were made his friends; his mercy in beseeching sinners to be reconciled to him; his readiness to forgive the most numerous and aggravated rebellions, and to confer all blessings on every one who applies for them; his persevering love to believers notwithstanding their subsequent ingratitude and misconduct; the example of Christ, “who when he was reviled, reviled not again,” but prayed for his murderers with his dying breath, (Luke xxiii. 34. 1 Pet. ii. 20—24.) the constant tenor of the New Testament precepts; and the rebukes given to the disciples when they were actuated by a different spirit, combine to show of what importance this disposition is, and undeniably prove that it is the certain effect of evangelical doctrines, well understood and truly believed, (Luke vi. 27—36. ix. 51—56. Rom. xii. 14. 19—21. 1 Pet. iii. 8, 9.) If the professed Christian loves those alone who are of his own sect or religion, what does he more than others? Or in what does the peculiar effect of his principles, and the grace given unto him appear? Indeed, this disposition is essential to the very exercise of living faith, and our Lord has expressly declared that “except we forgive men their trespasses, our heavenly Father will not forgive us,” (Matt. vi. 12. 14, 15.) He hath taught us to ask forgiveness of God, “as we forgive them that trespass against us;” so that the prayer of a revengeful man for pardon, yea, of every one who does not from his heart forgive his brother his trespasses, is in fact, an imprecation of divine vengeance on himself. He hath illustrated the subject by a most affecting parable, (Matt. xviii. 21—25.) and he requires us to forgive our brethren, not only “till seven times, but till seventy times seven;” yea, seven times a day, if the offender need it and ask for it, (Luke xvii. 3, 4.)

We are repeatedly exhorted to “put on, as the elect of God, (holy and beloved,) bowels of mercy, kindness, humbleness of mind, meekness, long-suffering, forbearing one another, and forgiving one another, if any man have a quarrel against any, even as Christ forgave us,” (Eph. iv. 1, 2. 31, 32. v. i. 2. Col. iii. 12, 13.)

Nor should this be confined to our Christian brethren; it must be extended even to our most furious persecutors, notwithstanding all their curses and cruelties; “for even hercunto were we called.” We are not, indeed, required to place any confidence in such men, or to confer special favours upon them; (for the Lord restricts his special favours to his chosen people,) much less ought we to love the crimes and society, or to countenance the heresy, infidelity, idolatry, or superstition, of those who hate the Lord; but we may express our decided abhorrence of their vices and errors, and oppose them with the utmost firmness; and yet relieve their urgent wants, assist them in perils and distresses, seek their best welfare, forgive their injuries, pour out our prayers for their conversion, answer their revilings and imprecations with mild language and good wishes, and persevere in endeavouring to “overcome evil with good.” We may lose the thoughts of a man’s ill usage of us, in considering the misery he is bringing on himself; and we may, from a sense of duty, take a decided part against him, as far as his conduct disturbs the peace of society, or tends to corrupt the purity of the church, even whilst resentment has yielded to compassion in our hearts, and our secret prayers form an authentic evidence of our love to his soul. Thus the judge or prosecutor may pity, and express good will to the criminal; in whose condemnation his duty requires him to concur. Thus a man may forgive, and show all proper lenity to the fraudulent debtor or assailant; whilst his obligations to his own creditors and family, compel him to seek legal redress for important injuries, or to ward off such as are threatened. And thus the zealous servant of Christ may write or preach against Antichristian or Infidel principles, in the most energetic manner, (provided he do not violate the rules of truth and meekness,) and yet he may be ready to relieve the urgent wants, and to pity the miseries, of those who hold them ; so that they who object to such conduct, certainly “ know not what spirit they are of ;” but vainly suppose those censures to spring from warmer zeal, which are the effect of an haughty, bitter, violent, and vindictive disposition. The Apostle James, emphatically says, “ Who is a wise man, and endued with knowledge among you ? let him show out of a good conversation his works with meekness of wisdom ;” and he adds, “ But if ye have bitter envying and strife in your hearts, glory not and lie not against the truth,” (as if the doctrine of Christ were to be blamed for this misconduct ;) “ this wisdom descendeth not from above, but is earthly, sensual,” (or natural,) “ devilish ; for where envying and strife are, there is confusion and every evil work. But the wisdom that is from above,” (the gift of God in answer to the prayer of faith, and the genuine effect of Christian principles,) “ is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, easy to be intreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality and without hypocrisy ; and the fruit of righteousness is sown in peace of them that make peace ;” “ for the wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God,” (Jam. i. 5. 19, 20. iii. 13—18.) In all cases, where boasting, reviling, slander, contest for victory, rash judging, misrepresentation, and a disposition to expose an opponent to ridicule, contempt, or enmity, are admitted ; where anathemas, or personal reflections foreign to the subject in hand, are vented ; or a desire of punishing men for their religious opinions, or of withholding from them the common offices of humanity, is intimated ; there the spirit of Christianity ceases, and the same principles operate, which kindled all the fires of Pagan or Papal persecution ; and whatever be the tenets or pretexts of persons, who indulge such tempers towards their own enemies, or those of their religion ; they are, (perhaps un-awares,) imitating, and sanctioning the very evils which excite their vehement indignation. It is in vain for men to say that they forgive and do good to their own enemies, and only object to kindness shown to the enemies of Christ; for how can the bitter persecutors of Christians be any other than the enemies of Christ? And did not all those professed Christians, who anathematized, imprisoned, enslaved, starved, burned, or massacred heretics, as they called them, by millions, pretend that they were actuated by zeal for the honour of Christ, and against his enemies? It is to no purpose to adduce a few passages from Scripture to sanction such a spirit and conduct; an inspired writer might properly denounce vengeance on the inveterate enemies of God, and utter prophecies respecting them; but such exempt cases do not constitute our rule of conduct, for that must be regulated by the express precepts, and by the example of Christ, as he was obedient to the law for us; nor may we follow even a Prophet or Apostle further than they followed the Lord.

Christian principles, therefore, will teach a man as far as he is influenced by them, to recede from his right for the sake of peace and love, in all things that consist with other duties; and to “follow peace with all men,” so as “to pursue after it,” even when it flies from him. He will especially endeavour to promote the peace of the church, and avoid whatever may disturb it. He will, “if possible, live peaceably with all men,” and will only deviate from this conduct when compelled to it by duty. He is also a peace-maker as far as he has any influence, both among his brethren and neighbours. He desires to be of one mind and judgment with all who love the Lord; and if he must differ from them in sentiment, he would differ amicably, and reluctantly; for he “endeavours to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace.” He aims to do “all things without murmurings and disputings,” and nothing “through strife and vain glory;” knowing that the “servant of the Lord, must not strive, but be gentle towards all men; in meekness instructing those that oppose themselves.” He is aware, that God alone can, “give men repentance to the acknowledging of the truth;” and that revilings and bitter sarcasms are none of the means which he hath instituted, and on which a blessing may be expected. His self-knowledge and experience forbid him to disdain or despair of others; and so long as he deems it right to address himself to them at all, he will do it with a hope and prayer, that he may yet be saved by sovereign grace.

The same principles influence the believer to cultivate an habitual forbearance, and a readiness to pass over and forgive the manifold little faults, mistakes, and petulances, which we must expect to meet with even in the best of men, whilst they continue in this imperfect state; for he knows that he needs such reciprocal forbearance from them; and without this mantle of love covering the multitude of faults, no peace can be expected in human society. He has been taught to bear without much concern, those affronts which proud men deem it a point of honour to resent, whatever consequences ensue; and if he be ridiculed or reviled for his tameness, he remembers the meekness of Christ amidst the scorn and cruelty of his enemies. His point of honour consists in not suffering himself to be overcome by any kind or degree of evil; in "overcoming evil with good;" and in subduing his own spirit; and his fortitude is shown, by facing dangers and enduring hardships, in the cause and after the example of Christ. But when he is conscious of having injured or affronted others; he will readily submit to the most humiliating concessions or reparation for the sake of peace. His principles also teach him, to avoid all irritating expressions, and to stifle every rising of resentment for injuries received; to fear harbouring a prejudice or grudge against any man, (for, "anger resteth," only "in the bosom of a fool;") to watch for an opportunity of convincing an obstinate enemy, that he bears him no ill-will, but would gladly live amicably with him; and to forget, as far as he can, the hard treatment he hath met with, not loving to mention it, or hear others expatiate on it, and only recollecting it in order to pray for the injurious party. But on the other hand, the same views will lead him to remember, and to mention, when proper, the kindness shown him ; for they lead to gratitude, not only to the giver, but to the instruments, of all our comforts.

I might further enlarge on the candour in judging of men's motives, and of those actions that may admit of a more or less favourable construction ; and the courteousness, affability, and affectionate behaviour, which Christian principles proportionably effect ; but I must not at present proceed any further. The Apostle's description of that charity, or love, which is even greater than faith and hope, includes all that hath been advanced, and much more than I am able to express. As a natural philosopher would define gold by its peculiar properties, which exist as really in a grain, as in a talent ; so he shows the nature of love itself, whether a man hath more or less of it. " Charity suffers long, and is kind ; doth not envy, or vaunt herself, is not puffed up, doth not behave herself unseemly, seeketh not her own " interest, credit, ease, or indulgence ; " is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil ; rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth ; beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things—and never faileth," (1 Cor. xiii.) As far then as Christian principles prevail, peace, harmony, and comfort abound ; and were they universally influential, they would rectify the whole moral state of the world. What then shall we think of those who spend their lives in running them down ; or representing them as of licentious tendency ? What shall we say concerning those who take occasion from the gospel to indulge their selfish, sensual, or malignant passions ? Or to what shall we ascribe the improper conduct even of true Christians, but to their want of a fuller acquaintance with the tendency of their principles, and a more complete experience of their efficacy ?

ESSAY XX.

On the Believer's Attention to Relative Duties.

THOSE dispositions of mind, which a real belief of evangelical truth never fails to produce, will be especially manifested by a conscientious attention to the duties of the several relations which constitute human society, according to the precepts and exhortations of the Holy Scriptures. By this indeed, the excellency of our principles is peculiarly displayed, and true holiness is distinguished from all counterfeits. Our natural propensities are so diversified by constitution, education, habits, connexions, and pursuits; that they sometimes assume the appearance of things spiritually good; for instance, a courageous temper may be mistaken for Christian firmness and fortitude; and an indolent or yielding turn of mind may pass for Christian meekness, pliancy, and compassion. Yet the counterfeit is perfectly distinct from that holy temper to which it is assimilated; and has very little effect on a man's general conduct, though it may be very conspicuous in a few detached instances; at the same time it unfits men for several parts of their duty, renders them peculiarly prone to sins which coincide with their natural propensity, and leaves them regardless of the will and glory of God, and of the true happiness of mankind, in their best actions. Even when the mind is in a measure influenced by divine grace, natural propensities may easily deceive us as to the degree of it; a harsh, rough, violent, or obstinate temper will induce an appearance of zeal and boldness in religion far beyond what is genuine; and on the other hand, will prevent superficial observers from perceiving, how much right principles have humbled, softened, and meliorated the mind; and this will also create the believer himself a great deal of trouble and uneasiness, perhaps to the end of his days. In like manner a timid, placid, indolent disposition, will give a man an appearance of great meekness and gentleness, even when he is but little influenced by right principles; whilst the greatest prevalence of grace in his heart, will leave him too yielding, and too apt to make improper compliances, and to decline hardships, dangers, difficulties, and contests, even on the most important occasions.

But when the Christian is followed into the retired scenes of life, the habitual effect of his principles may be more precisely ascertained; and his attention to the welfare, comfort, and peace of all around him, even at the expense of many personal inconveniences and much self-denial, will prove his piety to be genuine and of the most salutary tendency. This will, therefore, constitute the subject of the present Essay; but it may be useful to premise a few observations.

1. When we state the believer's relative duties, we do not mean that other men are exempted from the same obligations; but merely, that Christian principles, and the special grace by which they are planted and rendered effectual in the heart, incline and enable believers habitually to attend to these duties in the whole tenor of their conduct; though they do not perform them in that extent and perfection, in which they own them to be obligatory: whereas other men either live without rule, or lay down rules for themselves that differ widely from the precepts of Scripture; or they allow themselves habitually to neglect their known duty, in this as well as in other particulars.

2. The attention to relative duties, produced by evangelical principles, exceedingly differs even from that which results merely from regard to the authority of God as a Law-giver. In this case, the fear of punishment, and the hope of reward, are the only influential motives of a religious nature; and these, indeed, aided by self-love in its manifold operations, and by natural affections, may, in particular circumstances, produce a very decent outward conduct ; but believers, besides all these motives, are influenced by the constraining love of Christ, a sense of immense obligations received, a desire of adorning and recommending the gospel, and an unfeigned love to all around them, producing a permanent attention to every thing connected with their present and eternal welfare.— We therefore find, that the Apostles always inculcated relative duties from these and similar considerations ; and thus affixed an evangelical stamp to their practical instructions, as well as a practical stamp to their doctrinal discussions.

3. The believer indeed endeavours “to show his faith by his works,” but he also judges his works by the strict rule of the spiritual requirements of the law : so that whilst he hopes for a gracious reward from his reconciled God, according to the new covenant in the blood of Christ ; he is conscious that his best performance even of relative duties is so defective as to deserve punishment, if the Lord should be extreme to mark what is done amiss. He will, therefore, habitually connect the exercise of repentance and faith with all his obedience ; even when nothing occurs to bring the reality of his grace into suspicion.

4. The sacred writers generally begin with the duties of the inferior relations : whether it be, that these are commonly the most difficult to our self-willed ungovernable nature ; or that a greater number of believers occupy these stations ; or that the advantageous performance of the duties belonging to the superior relations, depends much on the conduct of inferiors. But however that may be, we must carefully observe that in most instances the failure of one party, in the reciprocal relations, does not excuse the neglect of duty in the other ; though it commonly increases the difficulty, and renders it a more severe trial of faith and obedience. In this the excellency of Scriptural principles especially appears : if we only behave well in relative life to them who behave well to us, what do we more than others? This is merely doing as we are done by, not as we would be done by. These observations having been premised, we proceed to consider—

I. The reciprocal duties of husbands and wives, as from this relation most others are regularly derived. The Creator himself instituted the conjugal union before the entrance of sin, for the most wise, kind, and important purposes, with which his whole plan respecting the human race was inseparably connected. He saw that “it was not good for Adam,” even in paradise, “to be alone;” and that “there was no help meet for him,” to be found among all the other creatures; no one suited to engage his affections, participate his enjoyments, constitute his companion, or unite with him in the worship of God. He was, therefore, pleased to form the woman from his side, as “bone of his bone, and flesh of his flesh;” to lay the foundation of a moderate subordination and most rational affection; and he gave her to Adam, to be his associate and counterpart, and to unite with him in training up their common offspring; that she might yield him the willing obedience of cordial esteem and affection, and receive from him the attention, protection, and counsel of wisdom, love, and mild authority. The Lord made no more than one woman for Adam; (Mal. ii. 15.) for the most remote desire of polygamy could never have entered man’s heart, had he not become a sinner. He joined Adam and Eve together, blessed them, and pronounced the union indissoluble by human authority; for no cause of divorce could have subsisted in holy creatures: and he added, “for this cause a man shall leave his father and mother, and shall cleave unto his wife; and they shall be one flesh.” To this original institution our Lord repeatedly referred in his decisions on this subject; constantly inserting the word twain, in addition to the terms used by the sacred historian, lest any corrupt interpretation should be superinduced.

Had not sin entered, this union would, doubtless, have subsisted during the whole term of probation allotted to

Adam and Eve, and to the rest of their posterity ; till they were admitted to that more exalted state, which was promised as the reward of entire obedience ; and that unalterable fidelity, attachment, and affection, which, with their inseparable effects, must have resulted from the perfection of human nature, are still required by the spiritual law of God, as far as circumstances continue to be the same. But many and great changes have taken place in consequence of the fall. " Sin hath entered into the world, and death by sin." The Lord himself often dissolves the marriage union, soon after it hath been formed ; and at what time soever this separation takes place, his word leaves the surviving party entirely at liberty to form another union, if that be deemed expedient. Unfaithfulness to the marriage covenant in either party, makes way for the dissolution of the union, as by a moral death ; and where it is clearly proved, without any suspicion of collusion, a divorce ought to be easily and certainly attainable. Various circumstances in the present degraded state of human nature, by weakening the authority of reason, and giving force to the passions, add to the original ends for which marriage was instituted. The manifold mistakes, imperfections, and faults, to which all are liable, render mutual forbearance, forgiveness, and self-denying concessions essential to connubial harmony and comfort : whilst the malignity, sensuality, and obduracy of which fallen man is capable, induced the Lord himself to permit divorces and polygamy among the Jews, to prevent more dreadful consequences ; but as the Christian dispensation contains no municipal law, it could not, consistently, make any such allowances. Moreover, the manifold sorrows, pains, trials, and temptations to which our race is now exposed, and the peculiar sufferings incident to the female sex, have given rise to a variety of duties which would not otherwise have been incumbent ; so that the relative obligations of this union vary exceedingly from what they would have been, had not sin entered, and become more difficult to be performed.

Several questions, often agitated on this subject, do not indeed properly fall within the design of these Essays ; but we observe, in general, that some legal and authenticated recognition is absolutely necessary, to distinguish this honourable union from all temporary and disgraceful connexions : for the opinion that the consent of the parties alone is essential to marriage, to which the outward ceremony can give no additional validity, is suited to answer the purpose of libertines ; and tends to multiply seductions, to introduce confusion, and to disseminate licentiousness. Should it be granted that this or the other form of solemnizing matrimony is not in itself of divine authority ; it must also be maintained that some warranted form is indispensably necessary : and it will follow, that the form appointed by the laws of our country is sanctioned by the Lord also ; unless it can be proved that he hath excluded legislators from making such appointments, by prescribing the requisite form in his holy word, or that the form fixed upon by them, is in itself a violation of the divine law.

It hath been observed that divorces should only be admitted for the cause of fornication, being expressly prohibited in all other cases ; but marriages contracted between those near relations, when the Lord for the wisest reasons hath prohibited to intermarry, are in themselves justly deemed invalid, and may properly be dissolved. In all other cases, however, “ those whom God hath joined together, man ought not,” on any pretence whatsoever, “ to put asunder ;” and the fewer restrictions to marriage are added to those expressly made by divine authority, the better will the true interests of mankind in every order of society be provided for. That polygamy also is expressly prohibited by the sacred Scriptures, must appear to every unbiassed mind who carefully compares together the passages referred to, (Gen. ii. 24. Mal. ii. 14—16. Matt. xix. 3—9. Mark x. 11. 1 Cor. vii. 2—4.) The intermarriage of the professed worshippers of God with idolaters and other open despisers of him ; and that of believers with those who are evidently strangers to true godliness, are prohibited, at least in all ordinary cases ; and the infringement of these prohibitions has in all ages been extremely injurious to the cause of religion, (1 Cor. vii. 39. 2 Cor. vi. 14—16.)

This may lead us back to our more immediate subject ; for the duty of Christians in respect of this relation, commences before they actually enter into it. When they deem it most conducive to their best interests and to their usefulness to marry ; their principles will lead them to acknowledge God in so important a concern, to consult his word, to pray for his direction and blessing, and to regard his providential dispensations in their determination. They cannot consistently treat this most momentous matter with a childish levity, or hearken to the corrupt suggestions of worldly convenience, avarice, or irrational attachment, or to the fascinations of wit, beauty, or accomplishments of any kind, in preference to piety. A suitable companion through the residue of life, who may especially be helpful in forwarding spiritual improvement, and concur in every pious plan of family-religion, and the education of children, should before all things be sought for ; though a subordinate regard to situation in life, habits, prospects, and natural disposition, may very properly be admitted. In short, the Lord, who knoweth all things, should be constantly and earnestly intreated to direct the choice and determination, and to give the blessing ; in order to which the advice of pious and prudent persons, and the judgment of affectionate parents and relations, should be attended to, as far as the word of God consists with their conclusions.

When the union hath taken place, the married persons should consider each other, not only as the objects of their own choice, but also of the Lord's choice for them ; and should constantly desire and pray to be perfectly satisfied with it. From that moment, the eye, the ear, the imagination, the heart, must be carefully closed against all other persons ; and every word and action cautiously shunned, which may excite an uneasy thought in each other's mind ; or which may give the least reason to suspect an abatement or change of affection. They should remember from the first, that they are both sinners, and must expect to be sufferers ; that they are absolutely insufficient to each other's happiness ; and that, whilst the Lord may render them instrumental to each other's comfort and welfare, they must expect to be also sources of anxiety and sorrow to one another in many respects, and at last to be separated by the stroke of death. That idolatrous, selfish, and carnal love, therefore, to which nature leads, should be steadily counteracted ; and grace should be sought, by constant prayer, to change it gradually for a more rational, subordinate, and spiritual affection ; otherwise it will at length either abate, be turned into disgust, transferred to another object, or prove the source of the keenest anguish. The mind should also be prepared by every consideration, for continual and abounding forbearance, sympathy, mutual concession, and self-denial ; without which the most promising prospects of connubial happiness will soon be covered with dark clouds ; and it should never be forgotten, that there is much amiss in every human character, and much alloy in all earthly comforts ; for too high expectations are the bane of satisfaction in almost every situation.

When both parties are real Christians, their reciprocal duties will be comparatively easy and pleasant ; yet even in this most desirable circumstance, the preceding cautions will not be found unnecessary. The general rules of conduct, for the wife, and for the husband, are laid down by the Apostle, with reference to the union between Christ and his espoused church, from whom all our motives must be deduced, and who in one way or other is our perfect example in every thing, (Eph. v. 22—33.) This allusion instructs the “ wife to submit herself to her own husband, as unto the Lord ;” for his sake, and as the church is subject to him, the preserver and Saviour of the whole body. The Lord has placed the husband to be the head of authority, protection, and counsel to the wife ; and she ought “ to be subject to him in all things ;” that is, provided nothing be commanded contrary to the will of God. The example of the true church shows, that the wife should render obedience willingly, from love and gratitude, with alacrity, and a steady desire of promoting the advantage, credit, and comfort of her husband ; even when this is connected with such things as thwart her own inclinations, and seem to be contrary to her own interest in matters of inferior moment. It teaches her to honour and reverence her husband, and to be very reluctant to discover his infirmities, or induce his frown ; to consider herself as no longer her own, to be at her own disposal, but as her husband's ; to make it the business of her life, in subserviency to the glory and will of God, to promote his happiness, and especially to soothe him when discomposed by the various troubles of life ; to accommodate herself to his station ; to avoid every expense that may involve him ; to concur in every prudent regulation to support their family ; and above all to assist him with her prayers and endeavours in every part of personal and family religion.

On the other hand, the husband may learn from this condescending pattern, " to love his wife as his own body," notwithstanding her defects and misconduct ; to treat her with the most persevering kindness and affectionate sympathy ; to endure hardship, and meet danger, in order to protect and provide for her ; to employ his authority wholly for her good, and especially in promoting her sanctification and salvation ; to admit her to a full participation of all the advantages attached to his station in life ; to soothe all her sorrows with a tender attention, and a self-denying endeavour to alleviate them ; not to despise her because of infirmities, not to allow others to despise or injure her, " but to give honour to her as the weaker vessel ;" to be as careful not to give her needless pain or uneasiness, as he would be not to wound his own flesh ; and to give up his own humour, nay, even sometimes his reasonable inclination, rather than ruffle her temper or give her umbrage, when by any means a temporary peevishness hath been excited ; and so to behave in all things, that she may find it easy to respect and esteem him. In general, both of them are required to watch over each other, to tend each other in sickness, to alleviate one another's cares and sorrows, to pray for and with one another, and to avoid whatever may hinder those prayers. Above all things, each of them must remember, to be most attentive to their several duties when the other is most deficient: for if only one party at once indulge a wrong temper, or fall into misconduct, few serious interruptions of domestic harmony will follow.

To these general hints, a few more may be added of a special nature. Sometimes it is discovered after marriage, that a mistake hath been fallen into, as to the religious character of the person with whom the union has been formed. In this trying case, great care must be taken that the mind be not alienated, or amicable intercourse interrupted, on that account; that no disgust be excited by reproach, or any expression importing repentance of the union. On the other hand, wisdom and grace should be immediately and earnestly sought, to enable the party to bear the cross cheerfully; to win upon the other by kindness and attention; to induce concurrence in family worship, and attendance on the means of grace; and to use a prudent caution that the circumstance may only be a cross, and not a snare to the soul.—By whatever means a pious person is thus united with an unbeliever, the same cautions are in a measure needful; and others may be added. The Apostle hath expressly directed that believers should not on any such account withdraw from their partners, but should abide with them in hopes of being instrumental to their salvation, (1 Cor. vii. 12—17.) In this case the wife, whose husband “obeys not the word,” should endeavour “to win him without the word ;” not so much by frequent and earnest discourse on religious subjects, (which ought to be introduced very cautiously, modestly, and affectionately,) as by a “chaste conversation coupled with fear,” or an union of circumspect fidelity and respectful submission; and to render herself agreeable to him, not by the vain decorations of elegant and costly attire, but “by the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit," and the exercise of all those holy tempers, the seat of which is in the heart, and which are "in the sight of God of great value." In such circumstances, it may be advisable to bear unkind usage or neglect with patience, or to wait for opportunities of mild expostulation, in humble prayer and persevering submission. Thus the cross may be lightened, which a contrary conduct commonly increases; and the best method taken of "adorning the doctrine of God our Saviour," and of giving an unbeliever an affecting proof, that the truths he rejects, are most excellent in their nature and tendency. Many of the same rules may properly be adopted by the pious husband, whose wife dislikes his religion; but in the superior relation there is a propriety in more explicitly and frequently introducing religious conversation, and in urging attendance on the means of grace, and concurrence in family worship. In both cases, such compliances, as cannot be conscientiously made, should be firmly but mildly refused; and in proportion to the degree in which a decided conduct is adopted, where the will of God is concerned, an obliging and yielding disposition should be manifested where personal inclination only is at stake, or where the matter is rather expedient than obligatory.

But there is a case of still greater difficulty, viz. when a believer has married an ungodly person, after having been competently acquainted with the truth and will of God in this respect. In general, such persons flatter themselves with the hope of being the instrument of good to the object of their choice, though the reverse is by far the more common effect. Yet this hope should not afterwards be abandoned; but deep humiliation, with earnest prayers to a merciful God, to pardon and over-rule for the best what cannot now be disannulled, should be considered as above all things needful. To this the observance of the foregoing rules should be added; and the consideration of the sin, by which the cross hath been incurred, should constitute an additional motive to persevering patience, meekness, and kindness, even in return for harsh treatment; and in one way or other, the Lord will support, comfort, and rescue such humble penitents, and make all to work together for good to their souls.

These hints indeed, are very inadequate to the full discussion of so copious and important a subject; but they may throw some light upon the path of those who read them with prayer, and compare them with the sacred Scriptures.

II. We proceed to consider the reciprocal duties of parents and children. This subject, indeed, has been already in great measure discussed, (Essay iv.) but a few hints must here be subjoined, beginning with the duty of children to their parents. The Apostle exhorts “children to obey their parents in the Lord,” in obedience to his will, for the honour of the gospel, from grateful love to the name, and in imitation of the example of the Lord Jesus; this being also right in itself, and required by the holy law of God. The general grounds and nature of this duty have been stated; it remains for us to consider it, as practised by a believer from evangelical motives. If such a young disciple have the blessing of pious parents; in honouring and obeying them, he will commonly honour and obey the Lord; and gratitude for the spiritual benefits derived to him, by means of their instructions, example, and prayers, will be an additional incitement to a respectful, submissive, and obliging deportment; to a steady concern for their comfort, ease, interest, and reputation, and to a self-denying, frugal, and diligent endeavour to ward off want and distress from their old age; as pious Joseph maintained his father and family, just as many years in his old age, as his father had maintained him in his youth. In this case it will be peculiarly proper, to bear with their infirmities, and conceal them from others; to submit to inconveniences and restraints in compliance with their wishes, and to soothe their sorrows; to consult them in every undertaking as long as they live; to pay a deference to their opinion, even when it is in a measure unreasonable, if it do not interfere with other duties; and never to grieve them by a contrary behaviour, without a very satisfactory reason, and with the most evident reluctance.

On the other hand, it sometimes happens, that pious children have parents, whom they cannot but consider as strangers to the power of godliness. In this case it must be a leading desire of their hearts to win them over to the doctrine and grace of the Lord Jesus; but in order to accomplish this purpose, it is peculiarly needful to watch against a hasty zeal, and a violent spirit. They would expect to be opposed in their religious pursuits; to be assailed by arguments and authority, and perhaps by reproaches and menaces; to be restrained by various methods from attending divine ordinances, and to be allured into such companies and diversions as are inconsistent with their profession. They ought, therefore, to beg of God to give them the meekness of wisdom, as well as a steadfast mind; that they may not refuse obedience in frivolous or doubtful matters, or in a harsh and disobliging manner, but where evident duty requires it, and with calm and mild declarations of the grounds on which they proceed. Thus it will appear that a Scriptural conscientiousness, (and not caprice, self-will, or self-conceit,) compels them to act in this manner; and in proportion as this is done, redoubled diligence and self-denial should be used, to oblige their parents in all other things. In general, children are not required to preach to their parents; at least every word should be spoken in modesty, tenderness, and unassuming gentleness; and they should rather aim to induce them to hear sermons, to read books, or to converse with pious and prudent Christians, than themselves to give instructions, or engage in arguments with them, except in very particular circumstances. For parents will seldom become docile scholars to their own children, especially if they teach in magisterial and reproving language. The most conclusive argument they can use, consists in an uniform conscientious conduct, an obliging attention, silent submission to undeserved rebukes, diligence in business, fidelity to every trust reposed in them, and a disinterested regard to the temporal advantage of the whole family. When a young person uniformly acts in this manner, he will have opportunities of speaking or writing a few words with weight and propriety; which being joined with persevering prayer, may at length be crowned with the desired success; whilst a contrary conduct will close a parent's ear against the choicest arguments and most zealous discourse. But however that may be, in this way he will adorn the gospel, and will be sure of meeting with the gracious acceptance and blessing of his heavenly Father.

ESSAY XXI.

HAVING given some brief hints on the conduct to which the principles of the gospel will influence the true believer in the filial relation; we must subjoin a few observations on the reciprocal duties of parents, whom reason and revelation unite in appointing to be the guardians of their offspring, in respect of their present and future welfare. Their attention, therefore, must not only commence from the time when they actually become parents; but many things should previously be arranged, with reference to the probability of this important event;—important, because every human being, that is brought into existence, must be completely happy or miserable to all eternity! From the very first, wise and conscientious parents will do nothing, for the sake of ease, indulgence, or any other selfish purpose, which may endanger the life, limbs, senses, constitution, understanding, or morals of their children: they will personally attend to every thing relating to them as far as they can; and will be very careful not to entrust them with such persons, as are merely influenced by worldly interest in what they do for them. They will perceive the importance of inuring them early to action, application, and observation; and of storing their minds, as they become capable of it, with information on every subject which can conduce to render them useful members of the community. They will endeavour to accustom them to such things as are of beneficial tendency, to preserve them from habits of indolence or self-indulgence, and to prevent their forming improper connexions. Many difficulties indeed must be encountered in adhering to such a plan of education; and the success will not always answer the expectations excited by it: but more may frequently be done than many parents so much as attempt; and the general education of both sexes, at present, seems calculated to answer any purpose, rather than that of regulating the judgments and improving the minds of the rising generation; of preserving their principles and morals from contamination; and of qualifying them for usefully filling up the station in life for which they are designed.

The word of God directs parents to rule their children during their tender years, by compulsion; and to repress their self-will and rebellious spirits by correction: that they may be early habituated to obedience and submission to authority, which will be of the greatest advantage to them during their whole lives, both in secular and religious matters. For the more any man studies human nature, and repeats the actual experiment, the fuller will be his conviction, that all attempts to educate children without correction, and to treat them as rational and independent agents, before they are able to use their reason or liberty, arise from forgetfulness of their innate depravity, and oppose the wisdom of man to that of God: and let modern manners evince with what success this has been attended*. Chastisement then should be inflicted at an early period, dispassionately, and in moderation; yet sufficient eventually to attain the end proposed by it, viz. to establish the parent's authority over the tender mind of the child. It is, therefore, improper in general to contest a trivial matter : for this must either give the correction the appearance of undue severity, or induce the parent to desist before the child has completely submitted. The frequency, severity, and passion, with which children have been corrected, and the bad effects occasioned by these abuses, have prejudiced numbers against the use of any correction. But to argue from the abuse of any thing against the use of it, is universally allowed to be bad logic : and if children were early taught in this manner to know that the parent would be obeyed when he gave a decided command, correction need not be often repeated ; and much less severity, all circumstances considered, would be requisite in education than is generally used. For when children become rational creatures, that authority which correction has established may be maintained by arguments, reproofs, commendations, and expostulations : whereas too many leave their indulged children without chastisement, till age and habit have confirmed them in stubborn self-will ; and then, by an unseasonable severity, complete their ruin. For, being exasperated by their ingratitude, they find fault with their very attempts to please ; and, by harsh language and usage, drive them into bad company and destructive courses ; to which case the Apostle seems especially to have referred, when he said, “ Fathers, provoke not your children to anger, lest they be discouraged.” (Eph. vi. 4. Col. iii. 21.) On the contrary, parents ought to use every method to render their children, as they grow up, easy and happy in their company, and confident of a favourable reception in every attempt to please them : for this tends exceedingly to keep them out of temptation, to improve their minds, and to render the parental authority of wisdom and love respectable and amiable in their eyes : and if they can allure their children to choose them for companions, counsellors, and friends, in all their undertakings, a most important point indeed will be carried.

It is also incumbent on parents, to bring up their children in that manner, and (if they can do it consistently with other duties,) to make that moderate provision for them which may at all events enable them to live comfortably in society, without being a burden to others, or to themselves. The Christian is not indeed allowed to seek great things for his family, or to be desirous of advancing them much above his own rank in life : yet he will judge it best, if the Lord will, that they should not be depressed very much below it, at least by his fault ; for that condition, in which men have been brought up, is generally the safest for them.

But the principles of the gospel will especially influence those who are actuated by them, to desire the blessings of salvation for their beloved offspring. This will induce them to recommend them to God in fervent constant prayer, from the time that they receive their being ; and to instil instruction into their minds as soon as they become capable of receiving it. They will early begin to store their memories with wholesome words ; to lead their attention to the simpler parts of the holy Scripture ; to impress them with a sense of their relation to God and to an eternal state, especially by means of family worship ; to bring them under the public and private instructions of faithful ministers ; to watch for opportunities of speaking seriously to them, and of inquiring what they have learned ; and to encourage them in proposing questions on religious subjects, by answering such as they can with propriety. (Exod. xii. 26—28. Deut. vi. 6—9. Psal. lxxviii. 6—8.) They will also endeavour to keep them from all places and companies, and to remove out of their way all books, pictures, or other things, by which their principles may be corrupted, their imaginations polluted, or their passions inflamed ; even as they would lay poison out of their reach. They will more decidedly reprove vice or impiety, than any childish neglect or waywardness ; and avoid all that converse or behaviour in their presence, which might counteract the tendency of such instructions, or sanction the pride, avarice, sensuality, love of grandeur, envy, or malignity of their nature.

It is peculiarly incumbent on religious parents to convince their children, as they approach to maturity; not only that they act in all other things conscientiously; but also, that they are more attentive to their comfort and interest, and more ready to forgive their faults, than irreligious parents would be: though they cannot tolerate their vices, or concur in exceptionable plans of advancing or enriching them; because the Scripture holds forth such alarming examples to warn men, not to gratify their children by dishonouring God or injuring their neighbours. (1 Sam. ii. 22—36.) It behoves parents, however, to remember the time when they were young; and not to thwart the inclinations of their children when grown up, without substantial reasons, lest they should throw snares in their way. They should rather endeavour to manifest a disposition to concur in every thing conducive to their satisfaction, if it can be done consistently; that by thus encouraging their confidence in them, they may have the salutary influence of experienced counsellors, when the direct exercise of authority would endanger opposition. In particular, they certainly should rather aim to guide, caution, and advise them in respect to marriage, than to compel and restrain them in an absolute manner; remembering that peace of mind, a good conscience, domestic harmony, and a connexion favourable to piety, conduce more to happiness even in this world, than wealth, or the confluence of all earthly distinctions. Many directions might be added, in respect of the conduct to be adopted by parents, when children appear to be under serious impressions; but the subject is too copious to be discussed in this place.

This is the most important perhaps of all relative duties, and the neglect of it is productive of the most fatal consequences; for besides those parents, who in various ways are accessory to the murder of the souls of their own offspring; even they, who seem to regard other parts of Scripture, often overlook the command “to bring up their children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord,” (Eph. vi. 4.) and either by neglect leave their minds like an uncultivated field, or by example and harsh treatment prejudice them against the gospel, or indiscreetly lead them into such distorted views of it, as are of fatal tendency. Indeed, the methods are innumerable by which parents fail of their duty in this respect; and whilst numbers act as if they did not much care, whether their offspring were happy or miserable hereafter; it is to be feared, that few, if any, are free from blame in this important concern.

It may here be proper to add, that they who in any way undertake to bring up the children of others, are required in many respects to perform the duties of parents to them. On the other hand, such young persons owe a measure of that respect, gratitude, obedience, and affection to them, which have been described as due from children to their parents; and this case is not altered, even when elder brothers or sisters are the persons on whom this charge has devolved. In like manner the other superior relations are entitled to a measure of filial deference and attention; and ought to perform many parts of the parental office to their junior relatives; especially if their parents are dead, or incapable of performing it, or be wholly inattentive to them, and they capable of bringing them up without burdening strangers.

III. The duties of brethren in the same family towards each other should not be wholly omitted on this occasion. The love, which is supposed to subsist among such endeared relations, is the Scriptural standard of that pure and fervent affection, which Christians ought to bear one towards another; the former, therefore, should not be treated as an instinctive propensity, but regulated by precept as a Christian duty. The children of one family, when they live much together, cannot, in the present state of human nature, fail to meet with many trivial affronts and injuries from each other, which will interrupt domestic harmony; unless great circumspection be used not to give offence even by rudeness and uncourteous familiarity, and a constant endeavour be made to oblige, and to render one another easy and comfortable, joined with persevering forbearance, forgiveness, and various concessions. For want of these attentions, perpetual bickerings and lasting animosities frequently supplant brotherly love; and they who should be, through life, faithful and tender friends, are often more estranged than almost any other persons! Of such bad consequences are the competitions, envies, and jealousies that take place in families! and so careful ought parents to be, not to lay a foundation for them by an injudicious partiality, and not to treat them as matters of little moment! (Gen. xxxvii. 3, 4.) They likewise who associate so much together, as young persons in this relation commonly do, must have many opportunities of influencing each other's principles and conduct; these are frequently made a very bad use of; and false principles are often instilled, and encouragement given to various things contrary to their duty to God, their parents, or others, even where no gross immorality or impiety appears. But that love, which evangelical principles increase and direct, will not only be disinterested, conceding, self-denying, liberal, and peaceful, but also prudent, pious, and holy; and they who are influenced by it, will aim by seasonable caution, counsel, or exhortation, enforced by kindness and a consistent example, and accompanied by fervent prayer, to guard such dear relations from snares and dangers, to instill good principles, and to win them to attend to the concerns of their souls. Nor will it be improper in this case to speak more plainly, and debate the matter more fully, especially with those who are younger than themselves, than they should do with parents or superior relations; and it is very common for the Lord to bless such endeavours, and thus to make them the foundation of the most permanent friendship. The duties of the other collateral relations, who dwell much together, are in great measure the same.

IV. The reciprocal duties of servants and masters are the last of those that belong to domestic life. The condition of servants differs widely at present from what it was when the New Testament was penned ; for then they were generally slaves, the property of their masters ; whose service they could not leave, but who might dispose of them as they pleased, or punish them with almost uncontrolled severity. This could never consist with the law of "loving our neighbour as ourselves ;" though it pleased the Lord to tolerate and regulate it in the judicial law of Moses, (as he did polygamy and divorces,) and the state of things, at the first opening of the Christian dispensation, rendered it improper for the ministers of religion directly to attack a system, which was inseparable from the foundation of every government then existing in the world. This difference, however, gives the greater energy to the exhortations which the sacred writers address to servants professing the gospel ; except that they may now leave those places where they are ill used, or in which they are restrained from attending on divine ordinances, or hallowing the Lord's day. Yet this liberty should be used with much caution ; for every place has its disadvantages, and every master, (as well as every servant,) his faults, and men often incur much detriment, and forfeit manifold advantages, through impatience under a single inconvenience. Especially servants sometimes purchase a trivial increase of wages at an enormous price.

The believer, therefore, who is "called being a servant," or who finds it necessary for him to enter upon this kind of life, should remember that the Lord hath constituted these different situations in society, for the same reasons as he hath allotted the several members in the body their distinct offices, viz. for the common benefit of the whole ; and that he hath chosen servitude as the best situation for him, to which appointment he requires his unreserved submission. He should also consider the place in which he lives, as the post for the present assigned him, which he must not relinquish without substantial reasons, nor without fervent prayer for direction ; and if this be determined on, he ought nevertheless to perform the duties of his place without remission, whilst he continues in it. If he wants a situation, he should seek a suitable one from the Lord, in dependence on his providence and promises; and prefer that which affords the greatest advantages for religious improvement, though it be somewhat more laborious or less lucrative.—And here it may be proper to remind both servants and masters, that though there are many vain talkers and deceivers, yet there are also true Christians; it is, therefore, the height of absurdity for believers to prefer the society of ungodly persons in any relation, because they have been disgusted and ill used by hypocrites. Men do not throw away bank-notes because they have been cheated by forged bills; and no disappointment should cause them to despair of finding the far more valuable treasure of a Christian master, or servant; unless any one should fancy himself to be the only true Christian in the land!

If pious servants are favoured with a situation in a religious family; they should remember, that equality in Christian privileges by no means implies equality in domestic life; instead, therefore, of behaving with an unbecoming familiarity, or neglecting their master's orders "as if they despised them;" they should "count them worthy of all honour, and rather do them service, because they are faithful and beloved, partakers of the benefit," (1 Tim. vi. 1—5.) And as they are conscious of much imperfection in themselves, they ought to make allowances for it in them also. They should value the privilege of family worship very highly, even though it be not in all respects conducted exactly to their mind; and they ought so to order all their business, that nothing may interfere with their constant attendance, or with the regular observance of the Lord's day. Should pious servants find themselves placed in families, in which they cannot but deem the profession of religion to be vain; they ought not hastily to mention their opinion, or speak about it with harshness; on the contrary, they should aim by a good example to exhibit the difference between the form and the power of godliness.

Even when they live in families where ignorance and ungodliness prevail; they ought not to speak freely on the faults of their masters, or assume the office of an authoritative teacher: for no man would be pleased to have a spy or a reprover in the character of a servant.

The Christian servant will especially aim to "adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour;" by cheerful obedience to every lawful command, diligence in all the duties of his station, and faithfulness to the trust reposed in him; remembering, that his maintenance and wages are the price his master pays for his time and skill. Consistency will require him to prefer the credit, advantage, or comfort of his master or family to his own ease or indulgence, and to manifest peculiar sympathy and tenderness in times of sickness and affliction; to speak exact truth on all occasions; not to furlain, or join with those who defraud his master in small matters; nor by any means at all to connive at such petty dishonesty, however sanctioned by custom, or whatever contempt and ill-will he may incur by his conscientiousness. It will dispose him to strict frugality, and to see that no waste be made; and also to consult his master's inclination in the manner of doing his work. If he be justly blamed, he will learn to bear it quietly, owning himself wrong, and doing better another time; if he be blamed without cause, or rebuked with harshness, (not to speak of more outrageous treatment,) he will endeavour to recollect the Scriptural rule, "of not answering again;" the neglect of which is productive of innumerable evils, especially to servants themselves, (Tit. ii. 9, 10.) He will remember that the Apostle says, "Servants, be subject to your masters with all fear; not only to the good and gentle, but also to the froward," (1 Pet. ii. 18—25.) and though ill usage may excite his passions; he will not deliberately say, "I do well to be angry;" but will consider him, who "when he was reviled, reviled not again," "when he suffered, he threatened not." For we all are called to copy his example, as well as to show the reality and excellency of our religion, by doing well and suffering patiently; and

however such a servant may be neglected by an austere, injurious, earthly master, yet he shall certainly receive a gracious recompense from the Lord, (Eph. vi. 5—8. Col. iii. 22—25.) Thus his principles will teach him not to be an eye-servant and a man-pleaser, attentive to his business only in his master's presence; but in singleness of heart to do the will of God, and to refer every thing to the honour of the Lord Jesus, and the credit of his gospel; not so much fearing man's displeasure, as disgracing the cause of evangelical religion by his misconduct.

Such an habitual behaviour, in a servant professing the gospel, will not only conduce to his own interest, credit, and comfort, but will procure attention to any serious remark he may make, or commendation he may give to a book or a preacher. It will discountenance vice and impiety, nay, perhaps it may dispose some to examine the nature of that religion, which produces such excellent fruits; whilst violent and zealous disputes for doctrines, in him whose conduct is disobliging and impertinent, not to say slothful and dishonest, expose to contempt the very truths for which he contends. The same principles will also lead a man to follow after peace with his fellow-servants. He will not indeed silently see his master defrauded, or join with others in riot; but he will avoid a morose and invidious conduct; not reporting or even protesting against trifles, but only against manifest evils; endeavouring by kindness, patience when ridiculed, and forgiveness when injured, to win their attention to calm discourse on divine things. He will also take care, never to seek his own interest by countenancing children in misconduct to their parents or each other; though he will oblige them for their good. He will not treat the indigent relations or dependents of his master with galling neglect, or attend on them with grudging. If he be obliged to refuse obedience to an improper command, he will do it with mildness and respect. If his time be too much taken up on the Lord's day, he will endeavour to redeem what remains more diligently; and if he be constrained to leave his place, he will be careful how he needlessly lessens his master's character in his own vindication. The same rules, with circumstantial alterations, suit the case of apprentices and labourers; and all who are employed by others, according to the degree and nature of the trust reposed in them, (Gen. xxiv.)

On the other hand, masters are also instructed in their duties, by directions and examples in the Holy Scriptures. The Christian's principles will influence him to consider true piety as an invaluable accession to the character of a servant, who suits him in other respects; and to seek the blessing with fervent prayer, and by making his place desirable to such persons. If he be thus favoured, he will endeavour to behave to his servant, as to a brother in the faith; he will make proper allowances for mistakes and defects; and value a servant who, on the whole, is faithful, upright, diligent, and peaceable, though he be not without faults; knowing how much the comfort of his family, and the best interests of his children depend on such domestics. If he meet with bad servants, he will strive to repress his anger, to avoid reproaches, and to behave well to them, till he can change them. If his servants suit him in other respects, but are strangers to religion; he will use all proper means of conciliating their minds to it. In general, such a master will not expect more work from his servants, than they can well perform; nor deprive them of time for relaxation and retirement. He will deem it his duty to give them adequate wages, and to make their situations as comfortable as he can. He will provide them with things suitable to their station when in health, and be very tender to them in sickness; procuring them help in their work under slighter indispositions, and proper advice if he can, in more acute diseases, (Matt. viii 1—9.) He will not think himself justified by custom, in turning away a faithful servant by sending him to an hospital, because he cannot do his work, if he have it in his power to prevent it; but will consider, that he who has the benefit of his skill and labour when well, ought to submit to trouble and expense for him when sick. Nay, if he can afford it, he will copy the example of the Lord, in respect of the aged ; as he does not forsake his servants in their old age, or when their strength faileth. “ Remembering that he also hath a master in heaven,” he will consult the interests of his servants, and be a sincere and faithful friend to them, in whatever may tend to their comfortable settlement in life. He will not keep them at a disdainful distance, or answer them with harshness, even when they are mistaken or unreasonable ; nor express discouraging suspicions of them, or descant on their faults to others.

The same principles will influence him, to consider the souls of his domestics as intrusted to his care. He will, therefore, order his affairs so, as may give them most leisure and opportunity for hallowing the Lord’s day ; and use his authority in enforcing that observance, (Gen. xviii. 19.) He will read the Scriptures to them, and join with them in family prayer ; he will arrange his daily plans in subserviency to that grand concern, and avoid whatever may prejudice their minds against it. He will watch over their morals and principles, and exclude from among them infectious companions, as much as possible. Thus he will make family religion the cement of family peace, and not only aim to influence his servants by love to willing obedience, but to give them cause to bless the day when they entered his doors, both in this world and for ever, (Acts x. 7. 22. Eph. vi. 9. Col. iv. 1.)

Many other relative duties might be discussed ; but this topic has already occupied a full proportion of the limits prescribed to these Essays —Subjects are required to obey the lawful commands of magistrates, to respect their persons, and reverence their authority, as God’s ordinance ; not to speak evil of them ; to pay them tribute conscientiously ; to pray for them, and to study to be quiet and mind the duties of their station.—The duty of rulers and magistrates, as far as it falls under our plan, will be mentioned in an Essay on the improvement of talents.—The poor should behave with respect to the rich, without envying, coveting, or repining.—The rich should be courteous, condescending, compassionate, and liberal to the poor; and set them an edifying example of piety.—The young should behave with modesty, deference, and attention to the old, especially to such as are godly, however poor they may be.—The aged should temper gravity and seriousness with cheerfulness and kindness, in their conduct to the young.—The faithful pastor will study from the Scriptures his duty to his flock; and the consistent Christian will, even in this relaxed day, consider himself as bound to honour, love, and attend to his faithful pastor.—In one word, true Christianity will influence every man to fill up his station, in the family, in the church, and in the community, to the glory of God, and the common benefit of the whole; and all, that come short of this, is the effect of remaining contrariety to its heavenly principles, in the judgment and dispositions of true Christians; and among those who name the name of Christ, but depart not from iniquity.

ESSAY XXII.

On the Christian's Improvement of his Talents.

WHEN the humble penitent has obtained peace of conscience by faith in Christ, and enjoys a prevailing hope of eternal life; he will be disposed, in proportion as his views are distinct and consistent, to inquire seriously by what means he may most effectually glorify the God of his salvation, and do the greatest good to mankind during the remainder of his days. For “the love of Christ,” (in dying on the cross to deliver sinners from the wrath to come, and to purchase for them everlasting felicity; and in calling him to partake of so inestimable a blessing,) “will constrain him—to live no longer to himself, but to Him who died for him and rose again.” This will induce him to consider, very attentively, what advantages or opportunities his situation affords him, of promoting the honour of the Redeemer's name; the peace, purity, and enlargement of his kingdom; the comfort and edification of his people; and the welfare, temporal and eternal, of the human species. These opportunities and advantages are commonly called talents, from the parable which our Lord spoke on this subject, (Matt. xxv. 14—30.) and doubtless this portion of Scripture, and that coincident with it, (Luke xix. 11—27.) relate entirely to this matter; and cannot reasonably be thought to point out the method of salvation, as if the improvement of natural powers or common grace could merit or procure special grace, as some have confusedly argued. For, indeed, special grace produces the inclination and disposition to use natural powers, and all other advantages aright.

There are a variety of endowments and opportunities, which may be improved to the best of purposes; but which wicked men employ in gratifying their base lusts, to the increase of their own guilt, and the injury of all around them; and which formal professors of religion, who harbour hard thoughts of God, and a secret dislike to his service, as it were, bury in the earth. Of these, the true disciple of Christ will avail himself; and by occupying with the talent intrusted to him, he will become, as “the light of the world,” and “the salt of the earth.” (Matt. v. 13—16.) Every man has some measure of these advantages afforded him, according to the appointment of infinite wisdom, which also assigns to each person his station in the church, and in the community: and if a man profess the gospel, the use he makes of these advantages is one of the most decisive tests, by which the sincerity of that profession may be ascertained, and the degree of his grace estimated. (2 Cor. viii. 7, 8. James ii. 14.—26. John iii. 17—20.) But the improvement, and not the number, of his talents, will be considered in the decision: “he that is faithful in little, is faithful also in much:” (Luke xvi. 9—12.) and whilst the servant, to whom many talents have been intrusted, may be more extensively useful; he that hath improved a very small proportion will be equally favoured of his Lord; and the poor widow's two mites may be more evidential of sincere love and fervent zeal, than the liberal donations of the affluent.

Every thing almost, that we are, or possess, or meet with, may be considered as a talent: for a good or a bad use may be made of every natural endowment, or providential appointment; or they may remain unoccupied through inactivity and selfishness.—Time, health, vigour of body, and the power of exertion and enduring fatigue, the natural and acquired abilities of the mind, skill in any lawful art or science, and the capacity for close mental application; the gift of speech, and that of speaking with fluency and propriety, and in a convincing, attractive, or persuasive manner; wealth, influence, or authority; a man's situation in the church, the community, or relative life; and the various occurrences, which make way for him to attempt any thing of a beneficial tendency; these, and many others that can scarcely be enumerated, are talents which the consistent Christian will improve to the glory of God and the benefit of mankind. Nay, this improvement procures an increase of talents, and gives a man an accession of influence, and an accumulating power of doing good: because it tends to establish his reputation for prudence, piety, and integrity, sincerity, and disinterested benevolence; it gradually forms him to an habitual readiness to engage in beneficent designs, and to conduct them in a gentle, unobtrusive, and unassuming manner; it disposes others to regard him with increasing confidence and affection, and to approach him with satisfaction; and it procures for him the countenance of many persons, whose assistance he can employ in accomplishing his own salutary purposes. For, as far as we are consistent in our views of our calling and business in the world, we shall, both in the concerns of our own salvation and in endeavouring to be useful, imitate the skilful mariner; who always keeps his port in mind, and gets forward in his voyage, by using every wind that blows to help him, as far as it can be done : and avails himself to the utmost of every circumstance that arises from currents and tides, to accomplish his purpose. We shall however obtain a more distinct view of the subject, by selecting a specimen of these talents, and the improvement of which they are capable.

I. Power and authority constitute a most important trust, committed by the Great Ruler of the Universe to some of the human race for the benefit of the whole, and of every individual as far as consistent with it. The Scripture represents all power as originally derived from God ; and all rulers as the ministers of his providence in governing the world, who must render an account to Him, both of the manner in which they acquired dominion, and the way in which they governed. Waving, therefore, all questions on these subjects, it suffices to say, that too many, who in any way have exercised authority over their brethren, have made a very bad use of it. Ambition, vain-glory, lust of dominion, rapacity, caprice, envy, furious anger, or dire revenge, superstition, or impiety, have often influenced them to employ the power intrusted to them, in exciting and waging bloody wars, destructive to their subjects, as well as to foreigners ; in oppressing and burdening the poor, in favouring the exactions and oppressions which they ought to have crushed ; in protecting and advancing the men whom they should have punished ; in harassing those whom it was their duty to have protected ; or in persecuting their peaceable subjects for their religious opinions ; and thus augmenting, by various ways, the miseries which they were exalted on purpose to remedy.—There have also been some who, as princes or magistrates, have upon the whole behaved negatively well : they have not waged unnecessary wars, or molested their subjects by oppressions or persecutions ; but have been peaceably contented with the splendour, dignity, and pleasures of their station, and have left it to their servants to keep the machine of government in motion. They have indeed done far less mischief than some others; but they have not done the good incumbent on them; nor prevented the evil which has been done, perhaps under the sanction of their names, and which they ought strenuously to have opposed; so that they may be justly said to "have buried their talent in the earth."— Other rulers and magistrates, from natural principles, have made, in some measure, a salutary use of their authority. They have enacted good laws, and administered justice with a considerable degree of impartiality; they have taken care to preserve their country from foreign enemies; and yet have avoided war as far as they consistently could, from a wise preference of the blessings of peace above the advantages arising from the most splendid victories. They have relieved the people from burdensome taxes, and defended the poor from oppressions, and the pious from persecutions; and, by thus providing for the temporal welfare of the state, they have obtained the endearing title of 'Fathers to their people.' The real Christian, when placed in authority, will carefully imitate this conduct from higher motives: and he will unite with it an uniform endeavour to render his whole administration subservient to the interests of true religion; and this constitutes the proper improvement of his talents.

But not only "the king as supreme," is intrusted with this talent: for all his counsellors and ministers of state, the members of the legislature, and the magistrates from the highest to the lowest, have a degree of power and authority vested in them by the great Ruler and Judge of the world, and to him they must be accountable for the use which they make of it. As they are placed in a conspicuous situation, multitudes scrutinize their conduct, either to censure or to imitate it; and consequently their example becomes proportionably more important. This will be an additional motive to the true Christian, to walk circumspectly and accurately; to show himself a pattern of a reverential regard to the name, the day, the word, the house, and the ordinances of God; of sobriety, temperance, moderation, and beneficence, in the use of outward things; of equity, punctuality, sincerity, and fidelity, in all his transactions, promises, and engagements; of meekness, condescension, courteousness, kindness, and compassion in all his deportment; and of attention to his domestics, and to all the duties of relative life. He will endeavour to unite wisdom, firmness, and justice, with candour and clemency, in his public conduct; to manifest a disinterested, impartial spirit, to be the patron of the poor, the oppressed, and the friendless; without respecting the persons, or fearing the unmerited displeasure of the rich and powerful; and to cleave to what is right, without warping, even when his conduct excites the censures and clamours of an ill-judging multitude. His principles will influence him “to love righteousness and hate iniquity;” to promote, to the utmost, the peace of nations, the good order of the community, and the temporal advantage of all ranks of men in it. But they will also dispose him to render all this subservient to still more important purposes; and he will aim “to adorn” and recommend “the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things;” to soften men’s prejudices, and silence their clamours, and to win their attention to it, by making them feel its benign effects. He will not, indeed, attempt to compel any man to assent to his creed, or conform to his mode of worship; for this can only make hypocrites; but many things may be done by those in authority, to promote religion, consistently with the most complete toleration. They may very properly repress, by coercive means, various kinds of vice and impiety, and endeavour to exterminate the seminaries and haunts of profligacy and villainy, and the schools of blasphemy and profaneness. They may furnish the endowed seats of learning with teachers of sound principles and good morals; and countenance every reasonable plan for the good education of youth, and especially for instructing the children of the poor. They may protect from insults, and liberate from restraints, such ministers of the gospel, “as labour in the word and doctrine;” and favour their being placed in extensively useful situations. They may select young persons, who give evidences of piety and ability, and assist them in obtaining that learning, from which their circumstances would otherwise exclude them. They may render the admission into the ministry open to able conscientious men, and close it against the vicious, the ignorant, and the mercenary. They may show a decided regard to upright, diligent, and pious ministers, who differ from them in some forms or sentiments; and a marked disapprobation of the negligent and profligate, who pretend to be of their judgment. Thus authority may be improved as a talent, in promoting the cause of truth and piety; in the religious instruction of the people at large; in preventing the effects of the indolence, carelessness, ignorance, and vice of those who ought to instruct them; and in countenancing such as would do all in their power for this purpose.

Books may also be dispersed, and multitudes taught to read. The attendance on divine worship may be encouraged, and every thing discountenanced that tends to keep men from it. Prisons, work-houses, hospitals, the army and the navy, may be supplied with diligent, able, and pious teachers: and various societies and plans may be formed and adopted, to promote this great end, by rulers and magistrates who are zealous for the honour of Christ, and the interests of pure and undefiled religion; and yet every man be allowed to worship God according to his conscience; and care also taken not to allure mercenary men to an unprincipled conformity. Thus the pious rulers of Judah, according to the dispensation under which they lived, restrained vice and idolatry, and supported the worship of Jehovah, from Moses, Joshua, Samuel, and David, even to Nehemiah: and true religion uniformly flourished, in proportion to their prudent and pious endeavours. Nor would it be easy to assign a reason why the same talent may not be improved to similar purposes by Christian rulers, according to the genius of the new dispensation; except it be thought, that because many have abused it by intolerance and tyranny, all the rest ought to bury it in the earth! a conclusion well suited to the lukewarm indifference, which, in this age, hath succeeded to fiery zeal and cruel bigotry, and assumed the dignified name of moderation! But all judicious Christians will, nevertheless, continue to beseech the Lord to make all kings and rulers, like Jehoshaphat, Hezekiah, and Josiah; that they may be “nursing fathers to the church;” and neither spare pains nor expense to disperse the knowledge of God’s word, by able, faithful men, throughout whole nations. (2 Chron. xvii. 7—10. xxix—xxxii. Neh. viii.) But let this suffice on a subject, coincident, indeed, with the plan, but in some respects, perhaps, out of the sphere of these Essays.

II. Natural abilities, and acquired knowledge, constitute a talent of great importance; as they confer a distinguished reputation, and as they qualify a man to propagate with effect whatever principles he adopts. Nor is there any essential difference in this respect, between the more solid, and the more showy kinds of genius and accomplishment; for each gives a proportionable degree of influence in different circles. Philosophers, poets, orators, historians, and other learned and ingenious men, possess a peculiar advantage for giving a good or bad bias to the sentiments and conduct of mankind; though much less ability will enable a man to do extensive mischief, than is requisite for enlarged usefulness; because our fallen nature powerfully inclines to that side. But, alas! it has been abundantly proved, that far more abuse distinguished talents, than make even a tolerable improvement of them: and the fatal success with which the deformity of vice, and the unreasonableness of impiety and infidelity, have been varnished over by vain reasonings, ingenious misrepresentations, and empty declamations, set off with all the charms of style and the authority of deep erudition; and with which the violations of God’s law, the neglect of his worship, and the contempt of his gospel have been disseminated, by men of genius and learning, in books of all kinds and on all subjects, can never be sufficiently lamented. Nor has superior eminence in painting, sculpture, or other elegant arts ; or the charms of engaging conversation ; or the fascinating powers of music ; or the talent for fine speaking ; or that for theatric imitation of nature and real life, been less fatally abused. If then every one must give an account to God, for the use he makes of his natural and acquired endowments, and for the consequences of all his actions, such as have employed ‘ talents angel-bright,’ during their whole lives, in doing the work of evil spirits, by poisoning the principles, and corrupting the morals of whole nations, and of successive ages, will one day receive a dreadful recompense for those works, which have given them the most flattering celebrity among their ill-judging fellow-mortals !—A man may, however, employ such endowments in a comparatively inoffensive manner, and yet fall very short of improving his talents. He may so yield to indolence, diffidence, and love of retirement, or be so incapable of coming up to that standard of excellency which he hath fixed for himself ; that he may totally slip his opportunity of usefulness ; waste the day of life in doing nothing to any purpose ; live plausibly to himself ; and, instead of “ occupying with his Lord’s money,” or even “ giving it to the exchangers,” he may “ hide it in a napkin,” and “ bury it in the earth.” We must not indeed conclude, that all who are reprehensible in this way are “ wicked and slothful servants” in their whole character : yet our Lord’s language on this subject, and the examples of those who on a death-bed have mourned over the opportunities of usefulness which were then for ever gone, should teach every disciple to be diligent “ while the day lasteth, and before the night cometh in which no man can work.”

But evangelical principles will influence the consistent believer, whilst careful not to over-rate his talents, seriously to inquire what advantages they give him for glorifying God and doing good ; and to endeavour to avail himself of them, without yielding to inactivity, despondency, fear of difficulties, or regard to the praise of men. A person of this character, who is held in estimation for learning or genius, may be very useful, even by sanctioning with his decided approbation the faithful ministers of Christ; by recommending instructive publications; and by professing and pleading for the doctrines of genuine Christianity, answering objections to them, and stating them in a clear and scriptural manner. His character will introduce him to numbers, from whom his undistinguished brethren are excluded; and give a sphere of activity in which he may subserve the temporal interests of mankind: and his principles will influence him to improve these advantages, that with prudent zeal he may recommend the gospel to them. As books written by ministers of religion are read with an absurd prejudice; (for who objects to a treatise on medicine, because it was written by an eminent practitioner in physic?) so the learned and ingenious among the laity may do eminent service, by a testimony from the press to the truths of religion, which will not have this prejudice to encounter: and the poor especially will be exceedingly prepossessed in favour of such plain tracts, as men of this character condescend to write and disperse among them. And surely none will deliberately maintain, that superior talents may be better employed, than in recommending those things "which angels desire to look down into;" and in glorifying Christ and promoting the salvation of souls. Learned men might also do eminent service, if they would infuse into those approved publications on various subjects, by which they attract the attention of mankind, a savour of evangelical religion; as an antidote to the poison conveyed in the poems, histories, and scientific treatises, which are sent out by the enemies of revealed truth.—In short, the consistent Christian will take care not to abuse his endowments in any way to do mischief to mankind, whatever lucre or credit it might procure him; and he will endeavour, with persevering diligence, to do good in the world by every means in his power: and if he have only a mediocrity of talent, he will occupy with it according to the duty of his station, as one who expects the coming of his Lord, and desires to be numbered with those faithful servants whom he will bid to enter into his joy.

III. The pastoral office is a subject of too great importance, to admit of any adequate discussion in this place. Yet, as a talent that demands improvement, it must not be wholly omitted. Such persons, as have been mentioned, may often be led to examine how far the due improvement of their talents may require them to enter into this sacred office; and though many considerations may induce them to decline it; yet the love of ease and lucre, or the fear of contempt, should not deter them. The sacred ministry is, in all respects, a good work; and he who desires to be the Lord's steward in so important a concern, should carefully scrutinize his motives and intentions, and seek, with unremitting diligence and fervent prayer, every qualification for the due performance of it. Alas! what numbers utterly neglect these things, and rush into this most sacred and important office, from the lowest motives, and in the worst manner imaginable! Let us pity and pray for them, for in general, "they know not what they do;" and perhaps they who design them for this profession, and they who concur in admitting them into it, have the greater guilt.

The Apostle's message to Archippus may be considered as addressed to all who are actually entered: "Take heed to the ministry which thou hast received of the Lord, that thou fulfil it," (Col. iv. 17.) Such are "stewards of the mysteries of God;" "ambassadors for Christ to sinners; "watchmen to give warning, as they will answer for it at their peril; "shepherds "to feed the flock of God, which he hath purchased with his blood;" "labourers in his vineyard, and "builders in his holy temple. Surely then they who have received such a ministry, should renounce "the works of darkness," and "the hidden things of dishonesty;" they "should take heed to themselves and to their doctrine;" "and they should labour and not faint," but "endure hardship," and face danger "as good soldiers of Jesus Christ." They should be "instant in season and out of season;"

and laying aside all worldly pleasures, diversions, and pursuits; all avarice, ambition, and mere secular studies, which subserve not the end of their holy calling; they should devote their hours, health, abilities, and influence to the service of the sanctuary, "giving themselves wholly thereunto." Nothing, however lucrative, creditable, or congenial to their taste, should engross those powers and that time, which they have most solemnly engaged to employ in seeking the salvation of souls: for the desire of spending their lives in this good work, in preference to more lucrative and easy situations, seems to be that very call of the Holy Ghost, by which men are indeed, "moved to take this sacred office upon them."

The consistent believer, therefore, whether his office in the church be more exalted or more obscure, will certainly endeavour to improve it as a talent, by all means in his power, and with steady perseverance. His example, domestic concerns, converse, doctrine, public ministry, private labours from house to house, attention to the instruction of children, influence over his brethren in the ministry, occasional services, employment of time spared from necessary duties, or money saved from current expenses, will all be adverted to in subserviency to the end he has in view; he will delight in his work, study the Scriptural rules and examples for his conduct, and pray to be made an able minister of Jesus Christ. But they, who are concerned in this subject, may easily enlarge on these hints in their private meditation.

IV. Wealth is a talent intrusted by the great Proprietor of the world to some for the good of many. It is, indeed, commonly so wasted in gratifying all the senses and appetites, "the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life;" or so hoarded up in idolatrous avarice, that it is considered in Scripture as exceedingly dangerous to the souls of those who possess it, (Matt. xix. 23—26. 1 Tim. vi. 9, 10. 17—20.) Yet the wise man had reason to say, that "money answereth all things," (Eccles. x. 19.) as it may be extensively useful to others, and thus eventually profitable to the faithful steward himself; and "the wisdom that is from above," will teach the Christian to make this use of it. The wealthy are not required in Scripture to part with their estates; nor is it generally advisable to abolish all distinction between them and their inferiors in their style of life. Nay, such men as are engaged in lucrative business, provided it be lawful and they are on their guard against its snares, will generally be more useful by carrying it on as the Lord's servants, and using its profits as his stewards; than by retiring from it in the prime of life, to a situation which perhaps hath not fewer snares, and certainly inferior advantages for doing good.—The consistent believer, however, will be influenced by his principles to retrench a variety of superfluous expenses, and exceedingly to moderate his desires of providing for his family, that he may raise a fund for charitable and pious uses; and whilst he shows a readiness for every good work, by which the wants and miseries of men may be relieved; he will especially endeavour to render all his liberality subservient to the more important interests of religion. This may be attempted by disseminating divine truth in the world, as the only seed of genuine piety and holiness, dispersing useful books, assisting in the religious education of children, training up pious young men for the ministry, or in various ways promoting the faithful preaching of the gospel. Wealth gives a man influence also; and the affluent Christian may use this influence to important purposes; and when the leisure it affords is accompanied by a suitable turn of mind, he may do more good by an edifying example, pious converse, and prudent efforts, in his own sphere, (from which others are often excluded,) than by retiring from it, even though he should expend in charity what would be saved by that measure. His conduct may likewise be rendered very useful among his tenants, domestics, and neighbours: and if he frequently disperse his charity with his own hands, accompanied by his pious exhortations, and affectionately serious discourse, it will have a vast effect in conciliating men's minds to his religious principles. But indeed, the reflections already made, suffice to show in general how his talent may be improved; and particulars on so copious a subject, in this compendious Essay, can scarcely be expected—only it may be added that far more should be thus employed, than commonly is.

They also, who are in more narrow circumstances, yet have a talent to improve even in this respect. Much might be saved from superfluous expenses by most Christians, to employ in those good works which are “through Christ Jesus to the praise and glory of God.” Nay, such as labour working with their hands, are expected to give something to those that are in want, (Eph. iv. 28.)

This specimen may illustrate what is meant by “the improvement of talents.” Many others might properly be mentioned; but brevity must be consulted.—Time is an universal talent which every Christian should redeem from useless ways of killing, that he may employ it in some beneficial manner: for idleness is intolerable in a disciple of Him who, “went about doing good.” Every man has influence in his own circle, however contracted, and may approve it to good purposes. For did we duly consider our obligation to God our Saviour, the great end for which our lives are continued, and the near approach of death; a desire would be excited in our hearts to live to his glory, and to serve our generation; and this would influence us to improve all our advantages to this purpose. And were every professor of the gospel “thus steadfast, unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord;” the blessed effects that would follow, may in a measure be conceived, but can never be fully estimated.

ESSAY XXIII.

On Prayer.

AS “every good, and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights;” so none of those things that accompany salvation, can be done in a proper manner and to good effect, except as we seek communications from God by the prayer of faith. It must therefore be essential to the design of this compendious publication, to treat expressly on a subject of such great use and importance.

The worship, which the Lord requires of us, may be distinguished into adoration, thanksgiving, and supplication. Contemplating the glories of his nature, as displayed in his works, and revealed in his word, we express our reverential awe of his greatness and majesty, and our admiring love of his infinite excellency, by adoring praises, and by celebrating the honour and harmony of all his attributes; recollecting our personal obligations unto him, as our Creator, Providential Benefactor, and Saviour; we declare our grateful sense of them in thanksgiving, general and particular; whilst the desire of holiness and happiness, and the love of our fellow creatures, joined to a conviction of our weakness and poverty, and a confidence in the Lord's goodness and mercy, dictate prayers for ourselves and others; and in all these respects we render to the Lord the glory due to his name. In speaking therefore more particularly concerning prayer, it is not meant to exclude or overlook the other parts of divine worship; but rather to consider them as connected with it, and as bearing a proportion to the enlargement of our hearts, "in making our requests known unto God." Yet as prayer is especially the employment of poor and helpless sinners on earth, and the introduction to those praises and thanksgivings, which are anticipations of the work and worship of heaven; so it may be proper, in this place, to confine our inquiries principally to this part of divine worship.

Prayer, in its very nature, is the expression of dependence, indigence, desire, and expectation. Petitions can scarcely be offered with propriety to those, on whom a man has no kind of dependence. The rich will rather buy than beg; but he that has no money, and is unable to earn any, is likely to be induced by necessity to the humiliating expedient of supplicating relief. Yet he cannot heartily ask those things of which he is not in want, or which he feels no desire to obtain. And at last, whatever his dependence, indigence, or desires may be, he will not be disposed to petition any one, whom he considers as totally unable or unwilling to relieve him.

Prayer, therefore, in the most general sense, implies a belief, and contains an acknowledgment, of the being and perfections of God, of his presence with us, and of our dependence on him for "life, and breath, and all things." It includes a consciousness that we are insufficient for our happiness; that we cannot defend ourselves from dangers and calamities, nor secure our lives, health, limbs, senses, mental powers, possessions, and relatives; that we cannot obtain the sure supply of all our wants, nor find comfort in life or death; and that all our fellow creatures are unable to do these things for us. It further supposes, that we earnestly desire the things for which we pray; and believe that the Lord is able, and hope that he is willing, to grant the requests which we present unto him. "He that cometh unto God, must believe that he is, and that he is the rewarder of them that diligently seek him," (Heb. xi. 6.) It is therefore evident, that all who deny the particular providential government of God; and so ascribe every thing to second causes, independently producing their effects, by chance or necessity, as to exclude the immediate operation of the Great First Cause, cannot with any propriety of language be said to pray. Whatever sense they may have of their indigence, and whatever may be their hopes and desires, they cannot feel a dependence on God, or form expectations of help from him; and every expression which seems like prayer, is either used by such men as a mere expletive without meaning, or it must be a virtual renunciation in that instance of their avowed principles.

But we are not so much concerned to inquire about the prayer that might be offered by rational creatures, who, however faultless, are, in themselves, indigent and dependent; as about that of fallen and ruined sinners: for such

we all are. This part of worship, indeed, may be considered as a duty required by the divine law: for the command "of loving God with all our hearts," certainly requires all men to beg of him to make them happy in his favour and presence; and sinners, (if allowed to hope for such a blessing,) must surely be bound to desire and ask for this forfeited felicity; for how can any reasonable being be supposed to love God supremely, who does not desire, and will not request restoration to his favour, renewal to his image, the enjoyment of his love, and the capacity of glorifying him?

Nevertheless, prayer is here considered especially as a mean of grace, to which we are directed and encouraged by the gospel. It is, therefore, in this sense, an expression of our entire dependence on the unmerited mercy of God, as justly condemned transgressors, for pardon, acceptance, and all things pertaining to eternal salvation. It springs from "poverty of spirit;" or a humble consciousness that we are "wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked;" (Rev. iii. 17, 18.) that we have neither wisdom, righteousness, holiness, strength, nor any disposition and ability for those things to which we are exhorted by the word of God; and that none of our fellow-creatures can give us any effectual help, in this our deplorable condition. It implies sincere and vigorous desires, yea, hungerings and thirstings after God and spiritual blessings, (which cannot be bribed, diverted, or assuaged by worldly things,) arising from a deep conviction of mind, that the declarations of Scripture concerning a future state, the resurrection of the dead, judgment, heaven, and hell, are great realities, compared with which, all else is a vanishing dream, and an empty shadow; and it imports also, that we have a prevailing persuasion and hope, notwithstanding our sinfulness and helpless misery, that the Lord is ready to bestow eternal blessings on all who apply for them in the way of his appointment. These convictions, desires, or preparations of heart for prayer, (Ps. x. 17.) admit of various degrees; but without some measure of them, no man is capable of praying aright. They who are wise in their own eyes, cannot be disposed to ask wisdom of God; the publican's prayer cannot be the language of the proud Pharisee's heart; nor the sensual, avaricious, or ambitious, sincerely request the mortification of their favourite passions, or the renewal of their souls to the divine image; unless some contrary influence hath begun to change their judgment and dispositions.

Hence arises that difficulty which men generally experience about prayer, and the need they have of forms and helps, even in their most secret retirement; for, in this case, such forms are often a vain effort to teach a man to pray for those blessings, which are diametrically opposite to his determinate judgment, and to the prevailing inclinations of his heart. The starving wretch, whose urgent wants have overcome his reluctancy to beg, needs only encouragement, and words flow spontaneously from his genuine desires of relief; but the rich man, who should choose to act the beggar, must learn his part and how to perform it, by rule, study, and practice. The fears, hopes, and desires of the condemned criminal, inspire him with an energetic, though perhaps rude eloquence, when allowed to supplicate the clemency of his prince; and even the little child finds apt words to ask his parent for food, and to complain of cold or pain. Why then cannot men find language, when they would beseech the Lord to give them the blessings promised in his word? Because the state of their hearts is so contrary to those blessings, that they feel no want nor desire of them. Did experience prove that the Lord uniformly conferred health, long life, wealth, success, and honour on all that prayed for them, men would generally get over their reluctancy to this humiliating service, (notwithstanding their natural independence of spirit;) and find no difficulty in framing pertinent, earnest, and importunate petitions for things so suited to their carnal minds. Yet they find themselves not only reluctant, but strangely at a loss, when they would pray for spiritual gifts. Wherefore? Because they are not congenial to the desires of their hearts. When our Lord on earth "went about doing good," they, who felt their miseries, and earnestly desired relief, expecting it from his power and love, applied to him with suitable and earnest petitions: but others were more ready to say with the unclean spirit, "what have I to do with thee, Jesus; I beseech thee, torment me not;" or to "intreat him," with the Gadarenes, "to depart out of their coasts;" than to cry after him, "Jesus, thou Son of David, have mercy upon me." Pride, therefore, a carnal mind, alienation from God, contempt of spiritual blessings, and unbelief, are the sole reasons, why men neglect prayer, or are unable to pray aright, except by the teaching of the Holy Spirit.

But when we consider how great, glorious, and holy the Lord is, and how guilty and vile we are; the question seems not so much to be, whether the sinner ought to pray; as whether he may be allowed to come with his supplications into the presence of his offended Sovereign? The humble and self abased will not doubt, but that the permission given to a rebellious worm, to present a petition for pardon and salvation to the glorious God, is an act of grace; and indeed, it is always looked upon as such, when a prince receives a petition from a rebel under a deserved sentence of condemnation. But the Scripture places this matter in a much stronger light; for the whole legal constitution, concerning the sanctuary, the veil, the priesthood, and high-priesthood, the sacrifices and burning of incense, and especially the great day of atonement, (on which alone even the high-priest might enter within the veil to the mercy seat, with the blood of the sin-offerings, and the smoke of the fragrant incense,) were most evidently designed to show what intervening obstacles must be removed, before the God of infinite justice and holiness could, consistently with his glory, permit sinners to approach him even on a mercy-seat, to present their humble supplications for pardon and reconciliation. And though under the New Testament we are invited "to come boldly to the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need :” yet we have no access, except by “the new and living way, which Jesus hath consecrated for us, through the veil, that is to say his flesh,” given as a sacrifice for sin, (Hcb. iv. 6. x. 19—22 ) and by his high-priesthood, which is the substance of all those ancient shadows. Whilst, therefore, we speak of the encouragements given to the vilest of sinners, even from the first moment that they desire mercy, to present their prayers before the throne of grace ; and whilst we determine, that prayer is a part of the worship required of us by the divine law, and, therefore, an universal duty ; we should never forget, that it is a most surprising instance of the Lord’s condescension and compassion, and one of our most valuable privileges, that we are allowed to make our requests known unto him, with well grounded hopes of acceptance ; for those actions may be our indispensable duty, which through our guilt and pollution it may yet be totally improper for the Lord to accept at our hands,” (Is. i. 11—15.)

In order to encourage the prayers of sinners, the Lord displays his glory from a throne of grace ; here he “waits to be gracious,” and to dispense pardon and every blessing, to all who ask for them by faith in Jesus Christ. Had he been revealed merely as seated on a throne of glory, sustaining the character of a righteous Law-giver, and an impartial Judge, a kind friend to the obedient, but a terrible revenger of the rebellious ; it might well have been said, “Jehovah reigneth, let the people tremble :” but as he hath made himself known on a mercy-seat as “God in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself ;” it may be said, “the Lord reigneth, let the earth rejoice.” The whole plan of the gospel, as it relates to the person, righteousness, atonement, and mediation of Emmanuel, is evidently intended to give encouragement to the trembling sinner to seek mercy from the God and Father of the Lord Jesus Christ. The general invitations of the gospel supersede the necessity of inquiring who MAY come in this new and living way ? “Let him that is athirst come, and whosoever will, let him come." The feast of divine love is provided, "all things are ready;" and the messengers of salvation are not only commanded to invite all they meet, but even "to compel them to come in," by every argument, persuasion, exhortation, and encouragement they can devise; for these are the means, by which the Holy Spirit produces the willing mind, and gives the praying heart. The very appointment of this way of applying for salvation, is a complete encouragement to all who feel desires after the blessings of the gospel, and are willing to become humble supplicants for them; as it implies that the Lord purposes to bestow them as free gifts on indigent beggars; and not on those who would buy, earn, or deserve them. For in this case prayer is the very language of poverty and distress, which guilt alone hath brought on any part of the rational creation of God.

Every general command or exhortation, therefore, to pray, is an encouragement to all who desire to pray; and whatever guilt they have contracted, or in whatever depths of temptation and misery they are plunged, it says to them, "Be of good comfort, arise, he calleth thee." Such general exhortations abound in Scripture; they are often addressed to the vilest transgressors, and are commonly connected with absolute promises; "Ask, and it shall be given;" "for every one that asketh receiveth, &c *."—Such promises do not indeed, engage that God will hear the prayers of the formal, the hypocritical, or the impenitent, who may (like the unclean spirit,) pray very sincerely, "torment me not," and yet hate true religion as much as ever; for "the prayers of the wicked are an abomination to the Lord." But when the vilest transgressor is so far humbled and softened, as to pray from his heart for mercy and grace, and all the blessings of salvation, as "the gift of God through Jesus Christ;" he begins "to offer the prayer of the upright, in which the Lord delighteth," (Prov. xv. 8, 9.)

* Is. lv. 7, 8. Jer. xxix. 11—13. xxxiii. 3. Ezek. xxxvi. 5—7. 37. Zech. xii. 10. Matt. vii. 7—11. John iv. 10. Acts viii. 22.

These assurances are confirmed by the examples of Scripture; when Manasseh, vile as he had been, began to humble himself, and pray to the Lord; he was not upbraided with his abominable crimes, but mercifully accepted, pardoned, and delivered, (2 Chron. xxxiii.) When it could be said of persecuting Saul, "behold he prayeth!" no further doubt remained of his acceptance and reconciliation. The publican, who loathed himself as much as the pharisee disdained him, and who, not daring to come near, or "to lift up his eyes unto heaven, smote upon his breast and said, God be merciful to me, a sinner;" went down to his house justified, rather than he who deemed it presumption in such a wretch to pray. Even the short petition of the almost expiring thief, "Lord remember me, when thou comest in thy kingdom," received an immediate answer full of astonishing grace. Nor is there one instance upon record, of a single prayer being rejected, except for the hypocrisy, wickedness, and unbelief with which it was presented. To all these encouragements we may add the frequent commendations bestowed on importunity, frequency, and fervency in prayer, (Luke xviii. 1—13.) and the testimony of all the servants of God to his readiness to hear and save them, from the most tremendous depths into which their sins had cast them, whenever they were brought to cry unto him, and say, "O Lord, I beseech thee deliver my soul."

If then the vilest sinner, from the first moment when he desires to pray, is warranted to come with humble hope of being heard and answered; the same considerations should much more enlarge the expectations, and confirm the confidence of those who, "continue," (or persist), "in prayer" from day to day; pleading with persevering importunity, all the promises in the Redeemer's name, and earnestly seeking for that wisdom, strength, grace, and consolation, which may enable them to live to the glory of God, as well as for the pardon of their sins, and the salvation of their souls. "We have not, because we ask not;" we are straitened in ourselves, not in the Lord; and did we more enlarge and multiply our requests, with greater fervency and importunity, we should be enabled to exchange many of our complaints for joyful praises. This is evident in a great degree from our own experience, if we be indeed experimentally acquainted with the life of faith and prayer; for who can deny that his inward supports and comforts, his strength to resist temptation, and to endure labour and suffering, have borne some proportion to his frequency and fervency in prayer?

The word of God contains the most decisive and emphatical language on this subject. The Apostle says, “The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much;” yet the only righteous men on earth are penitent believing sinners; and we are in many passages encouraged to expect the most abundant and surprising answers to the prayer of faith*.—Many curious questions have indeed been started concerning the efficacy of prayer; for “vain man would be wise,” but “the Lord taketh the wise in their own craftiness;” and such difficulties speedily vanish from the serious humble mind. Yet our Lord himself reminds us, that “our Father knoweth what things we have need of, before we ask him †;” and it is obvious that prayer cannot be requisite for the information of Omniscience, or to dispose the God of all grace to supply our wants. But when seriously engaged in, it tends directly to increase our acquaintance with ourselves, with our own character and wants; to lead our attention to the promises of God; to abstract the mind from all selfish and carnal confidences; and thus to bring us into that humble, dependent, and waiting frame of spirit, which is the preparation for duly receiving and using every divine blessing. To pray in a suitable manner is in effect to say, ‘Lord, we are poor, vile, helpless, wretched creatures; we have no other refuge to flee to, we know not what to do, but our eyes are unto thee, because we believe that thou art ever ready to forgive and save all that call upon thee.' As, therefore, the parent requires the child to ask those things that he intends to give, that the child may feel his dependence and obligation, and be brought to a proper disposition towards the parent; so the Lord requires us "to make our requests known unto him," that we may be prepared to receive his intended benefits with thankfulness, to notice his hand in them, and to give him the glory of them. And when our prayers accord to his precepts, are grounded on his promises, imply submission to his providence, and spring from a supreme desire of spiritual blessings; when we pray for those things that are truly good for us, conducive to the advantage of our brethren, or in any way honourable to his name; we cannot expect too much in answer to them; for "He is able to do exceeding abundantly, above all that we ask, or think."

The Scripture abounds with examples of the efficacy of prayer. Abraham ceased to ask, even in behalf of Sodom, before the Lord refused to answer him; and "God remembered Abraham," in preserving Lot from the overthrow, (Gen. xviii. 17—33. xix. 29.) Jacob "wrestled with God, and prevailed" with him; and in consequence Esau's heart was softened and his rage disarmed; he set out an enemy, yet met him as a brother, (Gen. xxxii. xxxiii.) When Moses prayed, Amalek was discomfited; and when he pleaded for Israel, the Lord said, "Let me alone, that I may destroy them." The time would fail to speak of David, Asa, Jehoshaphat, Hezekiah, Nehemiah, and many others. Doubtless, the conversion of Saul was an answer to the prayer of dying Stephen; and we may suppose that the believers at Damascus were heard in their cries for protection from that cruel persecutor, in a manner beyond their own most enlarged expectations; and so likewise were those at Jerusalem, when they prayed for Peter's deliverance from Herod, (Acts xii.)

But, indeed, except in the case of miraculous interpositions, the same is still experienced, and the more any man has made the trial, the fuller will be his assent to this truth.

The Christian who has been frequent, fervent, and particular in his supplications for a length of time, has, doubtless, found that many of his petitions, (defective and defiled as he knows them to be,) have been manifestly answered, both in his own temporal and spiritual concerns, and in behalf of others; often beyond his expectations, and contrary to apparent probability. Some requests have also been granted, not exactly in his meaning, but in a far more desirable way. He has prayed for the removal of the "thorn in the flesh:" but the Lord hath answered him by showing the sufficiency of his grace, and employing the trial "to humble and prove him, and to do him good at the latter end;" (2 Cor. xii. 1—10.) so that the things that seemed the most against him, have most effectually promoted his highest interest. Or he has found his prayers answered, by feeling his mind wonderfully reconciled to a denial, from a conviction that "he knew not what he asked;" or by a calm serenity in waiting the Lord's time for those things which he had impatiently desired. The causes of his perturbation and anxiety remain, after his prayers have been presented before God; but the solicitude itself has given place to a divine "peace which passeth all understanding;" for "he called on the Lord, and was strengthened with strength in his soul." In short, he can scarcely produce an instance, in which he "poured out his heart," with earnestness and importunity, and yet failed of obtaining the blessing he sought, or was not after a time satisfied with the denial. In many cases his intercessions for those around him, have been graciously answered; in others he may still retain hope; and in all he may be assured, that they will return into his own bosom.

The efficacy, therefore, of prayer, to bring light and wisdom into the mind, peace into the conscience, submission into the will, and purity into the affections; to keep our garments clean, our armour bright, and our hearts joyful; to make us strong for the conflict, for service, or for suffering; to obtain sufficiency for our place and work, and a blessing on our endeavours; to secure peace with our enemies, or protection against them ; to carry every point that is truly good for us ; to bring down blessings on our families, friends and country ; to procure peace and prosperity to the church, the conversion of sinners, and the spread of the gospel ; and for all things which we can desire or conceive, must be allowed by every man who reverences the Scriptures, or knows what it is, "to walk with God." Did men speculate and dispute less, and pray more, their souls would be like a watered garden ; fruitful, joyful, beautiful, and fragrant. Prayer is the first breath of divine life : it is the pulse of the believing soul, the best criterion of health or sickness, vigour or debility. By prayer we draw water with joy from the wells of salvation ; by prayer faith puts forth its energy, in apprehending the promised blessings, and receiving from the Redeemer's fulness ; in leaning on his Almighty arm, and making his name our strong tower ; and in overcoming the world, the flesh, and the devil. All other means of grace are made effectual by prayer ; every doctrine and instruction produces its effect, in proportion as this is attended to ; even grace revives or languishes according to the same rule. Our grand conflict with satan and our own hearts, is about prayer : the sinner feels less reluctance and meets less resistance, in respect of all other means of grace, than in retiring to pour out his heart before God in secret ; and the believer will find his chief difficulty to consist in continuing instant and fervent in this spiritual exercise. If he succeed here, all else will eventually give place before him, and turn out to his benefit and comfort.

It should likewise be remembered that prayer may be either public, social, or secret. Public worship most honours God, and is the grand end of our assembling together ; though few seem thus to understand it. Social worship tends greatly to maintain brotherly love, and to bring down blessings on families and societies. But secret prayer is the grand mean of maintaining communion with God, and keeping alive the power of religion in the soul. Without this, the others degenerate into formality ; and the man himself continues devoid of life, strength, and comfort, in the midst of them. Christians should therefore remember to prepare for public and social worship, by secret prayer, meditation, and reading the Scriptures ; and not yield to the temptation of neglecting the one, by spending too much time in the other.

If we desire to pray aright, we must carefully observe, that the Scripture always calls upon us “ to pray in the Spirit,” or “ in the Holy Ghost,” or rather “ by the Spirit :” our first petition, therefore, should be, that the Lord would graciously give us his Holy Spirit, to teach and enable us to pray. When this is duly attended to, a very heartless beginning will often have a bright and encouraging conclusion, and our desires may be too large, even for utterance ; but without it, words will often flow, that have little meaning and no correspondent affections. (Rom. viii. 26, 27.) We should also be very particular in our secret devotions ; both in confession, in supplication for temporal and spiritual mercies, according to our circumstances, in thanksgivings, and in prayers for others : for whilst men deal in general words, they must either be very short, and superficial, or run into needless repetitions. Occasional ejaculatory petitions also are a blessed addition to stated seasons of retirement.—All our prayers should be explicitly offered in the name, and through the intercession, of the divine Saviour ; in dependence on his merits, with realizing expectation of success, and in a loving forgiving spirit.

Finally, a thorough acquaintance with the devotional part of the psalms ; the petitions contained in other parts of Scripture ; and a careful observation of the requests which the sacred penmen offered, the pleas they used, the order and proportion they observed, and the confessions, adorations and grateful praises they intermixed [with their fervent supplications for personal and public, temporal and spiritual mercies, will be more useful to the serious Christian, in this part of religion, than all other helps whatever. Above all, the LORD'S PRAYER, well understood and digested, will teach him what the confidence and leading desire of his heart in every prayer should be ; what are the blessings especially to be sought for ; and with what moderation and submission he should ask for temporal mercies, compared with the forgiveness of his sins, and deliverance from temptation and the tempter, from evil and the evil one : that in approaching the throne of grace, he may “ seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness ; assured that “ all other things will be added unto him.”

ESSAY XXIV.

On Baptism and the Lord's Supper.

AMONG the ordinances, which the Lord hath appointed in his church, as means of grace and acts of solemn worship, some have, from the earliest times, been distinguished by the name of Sacraments. The word Sacrament originally signified the military oath which the commanders of the Roman armies required from their soldiers ; and these institutions were considered as solemn engagements to be faithful and obedient to Christ, under whose banner all Christians have enlisted. In process of time sacraments were multiplied, which gave rise to immense superstition and absurdity : and as human nature continually verges to extremes, so it may be doubted, whether numbers have not lately been induced too much to disregard all distinctions of this kind. The word, however, is not scriptural ; and the nature of the two solemn ordinances, which Protestants consider the only Sacraments under the Christian dispensation, seems in general, to be this : ‘ In them divine truths are exhibited to our senses, ‘ and illustrated to our minds, by outward emblems, and ‘ the reception of spiritual blessings is represented by significant actions. Thus observances in themselves indif‘ferent, by divine appointment become a part of religious ‘worship, honourable to God, and profitable to us; and ‘positive duties arise, where none before subsisted by mo‘ral obligation.’

* Baptism is the initiatory ordinance of Christianity; as circumcision under the old dispensation, from Abraham to the ascension of Christ, was the door of admission into the visible church. It consists in the application of water to the baptized person, “in the name, of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.” Water is the universal purifier of our persons, garments, houses, streets, and cities; it is essential to the beauty and fertility of the earth; and it is the original element from which every liquor, that quenches our thirst or exhilarates our spirits, is derived. It is therefore, the constant and most expressive scriptural emblem of the pure and satisfying blessings, conveyed to us by the gospel; especially of the purifying, enlivening, fructifying, and consolatory influences of the Holy Ghost: and many ceremonies of the law, as well as the introductory baptism of John, exhibited these benefits by the use of it. The whole of that happy change, which the Apostle describes, may be denoted by the baptismal water; “But ye are washed, but ye are sanctified, but ye are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God.” (1 Cor. vi. 9—11.) This accords with the Lord’s promises by

* The design of this compendious publication renders it wholly improper to treat of this subject in a controversial manner. After a long and patient investigation, and mature reflection, the writer is a Pædo-Baptist; and his discussions will consequently be most applicable to those, who coincide with him in sentiment and practice. But he considers all as brethren who “love the Lord Jesus in sincerity:” and would not willingly offend any man, who conscientiously differs from him in such matters: he therefore reasonably hopes for similar candour from his readers. The disputes about the mode and subjects of Baptism seem to have too long occupied a disproportionate degree of attention; whilst numbers remain ignorant of the nature and obligations of the ordinance itself. Mr. Henry’s observation seems well grounded; ‘If infant-baptism were more conscientiously improved, it would be less disputed.’

his prophet—"Then will I sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean; from all your filthiness, and from all your idols will I cleanse you;" and with various other passages in the sacred oracles. (Ezek. xxxvi. 25—27. Ps. li. 2. 7. Zech. xii. 1. John xiii. 8. xix. 24. Eph. v. 26, 27. 1 John v. 6. Rev. i. 5. vii. 14.) Yet Baptism seems more immediately to represent the purifying of the judgment and affections from the pollution of sin, by the sanctification of the Holy Spirit. The beginning of this work is therefore described with reference to the outward emblem, as being "born of water and of the Spirit;" it is called "the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost, which God our Saviour pours upon us abundantly;" and it is especially, though not exclusively, meant by "the baptism of the Holy Ghost." (John i. 31—33. iii. 3—8. Tit. iii. 5, 6.)

The appointment of this emblem, in the initiatory ordinance of Christianity, emphatically testifies the doctrine of original sin, and the necessity of regeneration: for it declares every man, as "born of the flesh," to be so polluted, that unless he be washed with purifying water, he cannot be received even into the outward church of God: and unless he be inwardly cleansed by the Holy Spirit, he cannot be a member of the true church. In this, it coincides with circumcision, which implied, that without the mortification of the corrupt nature derived by generation from fallen Adam, and the removal of that obstacle to the love and service of God, no man could be admitted into covenant with him. (Deut. xxx 6. Jer. iv. 4. Rom. ii. 28, 29.) And like that ordinance, it is "the seal of the righteousness of faith;" for he, and he alone, who possesses the inward and spiritual grace, which both circumcision and baptism outwardly denoted, has a divine attestation to the sincerity of his faith, and to the reality of his justification in the righteousness of the Redeemer. The form of baptism, "in," or into, "the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," contains an unanswerable argument for the doctrine of the Trinity, and constitutes a perpetual profession of it: it implies also that the baptized person is the avowed worshipper and servant of God "the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost," who is become the Salvation and Portion of his people.

When the Apostles went forth "to teach," or disciple, "all nations," to baptize them in this name, and afterwards to teach them more fully all things that Christ had commanded, that they might observe them, (Matt. xxviii. 19, 20.) the converts, whether made from among the Jews or Gentiles, were baptized on an intelligent profession of repentance and faith. When the Jews made proselytes to their religion, they circumcised the adult males on such a profession, according to the nature of their dispensation; and Pædo-baptists, in similar circumstances, would adopt the same conduct. But we maintain, (for reasons that have been repeatedly assigned,) that as the Jews circumcised likewise all the males in the families of the proselytes, who were incapable of personally rejecting the Jewish religion; so the Apostles baptized the households of their converts; including the females, and only excluding such, as, being able to answer for themselves, gave evidence, by word or deed, that they did not obey the truth. Nay, we are of opinion that those children, who had one believing parent, though the other continued an unbeliever, were thus admitted, as relatively holy, into the visible church of Christ. (Acts xvi. 3. 15. 33. Rom. xi. 16, 17. 1 Cor. i. 16. vii. 14.)

The adult convert, by receiving baptism, acknowledged, according to the obvious meaning of the ordinance, that he was a sinner by nature and practice; that he repented of his sins, and believed in Christ for the forgiveness of them; that he renounced idolatry, and all other objects or forms of worship, "to serve the one living and true God," in whose name he was baptized; that he cordially believed the truths of the gospel, and relied on the mercy of the Father, on the mediation of the incarnate Son, and on the grace of the Holy Spirit, for complete salvation; and that he sincerely purposed to forsake all his sins, and every confidence, pursuit, interest, or indulgence, which interfered with these engagements. Thus he openly joined himself to the Lord, according to the new covenant in Christ Jesus; and embracing its benefits as his portion and salvation, he solemnly vowed to renounce the world, deny himself, bear his cross, endure persecution and hardship, and fight against sin and satan, as a faithful soldier of Jesus Christ, to the end of his days; and doubtless prayers, instructions, professions, and engagements to this effect, accompanied the administration of baptism, as circumstances required or admitted of them. Such a solemn transaction would tend exceedingly to confirm the faith, to excite the love, to strengthen the mind, and to encourage the hope of the true convert. And though an hypocritical profession could answer none of these purposes; yet we cannot determine, that confused views, partial convictions, and general purposes of following Christ, might not frequently issue in true conversion, even by means of this ordinance, and the prayers, instructions, and admonitions, which preceded, attended, and followed it; for it does not become us to limit the operations of the Holy Spirit. The public administration of baptism would likewise honour God, and the Christian religion; establish and edify believers by reminding them of their privileges and vows; make way for subsequent exhortations, admonitions, or censures, in respect of the baptized person, as occasion required; and excite the attention of numbers to the peculiar doctrines of Christianity.

The baptism of the infant-offspring of such converts was likewise a solemn declaration that they desired the same blessings for their children, as they had chosen for their own portion; and they thus pledged themselves to the church, "to bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord;" giving them every instruction, and using all means of rendering them wise unto salvation. When they brought the children, which were afterwards born to them, to be baptized, they virtually renewed their former profession and engagements, and declared their persevering purpose of instructing and commanding their households in the fear of God; and as the children grew up, such of them as profited by these means, would personally accept of the privileges, and enter into the engagements, peculiar to Christianity, in the manner that will shortly be considered.

As the number of professed Christians increased, the baptism of infants would proportionably grow more common; and when the progress of the gospel among Jews and gentiles was less rapid, the baptism of adults would not occur so frequently. This accords with facts; and when the progress of error and superstition made way for the nominal conversion, and the baptism, of whole nations, the baptism of adults was seldom heard of, in countries previously professing Christianity. The indiscriminate administration of infant-baptism, however, arising from a concurrence of causes during many centuries, has produced many very bad effects; and the abuses, misapprehensions, and criminal conduct, which too manifestly connect with it, have given many pious persons a rooted aversion to that way of administering the ordinance, and have furnished them with plausible objections against it. But when a serious parent is persuaded, (notwithstanding all these crimes and abuses,) that the baptism of the infant-offspring of believers accords to the word of God, and, in compliance with what he judges his duty, presents his children to be baptized; he solemnly ratifies and renews the profession and engagements of his own baptism; he avows his earnest desire, that the covenant made with him may be for the good of his seed also, (Jer. xxxii. 38—40. Acts ii. 38, 39.) and he engages to bring them up in the faith and obedience of the gospel, as far as his instructions, discourse, example, and prayers can have any influence. As they grow up, he, or other serious relations, may profitably explain to them the nature, meaning, and engagements of baptism; the blessings it signifies; the advantages of being thus early admitted into the visible church, and trained up as her children; and the aggravated guilt of deliberate ly rejecting the salvation and service of God, from pride of heart and carnal affections; or even of neglecting the means of appropriating these advantages, and complying with those engagements, which their parents, or senior friends, had entered into in their name, and for their benefit. Thus an additional avenue is opened to the consciences of young persons, and an additional restraint imposed on their passions.—Ministers also may employ these topics with great advantage, in addressing both the parents and the children, and even such as wish to have their offspring baptized; and if this was done frequently and generally, both in public and private; if baptism was administered solemnly before the congregation, and proper reference made to it in the sermon; and if some discouraging barriers to these things were removed, the most diffusive good might be expected.

But even as matters now stand, the administration of infant-baptism has great influence, in giving vast multitudes some ideas of the gospel, especially of original sin, regeneration, and the Trinity; and whilst all who act profanely, deceitfully, or formally, in this matter, must answer for their own crimes; if good be done, either to parents, children, or others, and if the name of God be in any measure glorified; the end of the institution is so far answered, even though no special benefit should be thought to accrue to the baptized person. The pious parent may therefore rest satisfied with performing what he considers his duty. If the child live, the transaction may be useful, by way of subsequent improvement; nay, we must allow, that the Holy Spirit may in some cases regenerate the infant, in answer to the prayers of believing friends, even at the time of baptism; without confounding the outward sign with the thing signified, or supposing the sacrament to produce the effect by its own inherent energy. Many other things connected with this subject must be waved, for the sake of brevity; but these hints may perhaps assist some plain Christians to understand the nature of baptism, and their duties and obligations respecting it. The outward sign doubtless will not profit those who live and die without 'the inward and spiritual grace,' even 'a death unto sin, and a new birth unto righteousness;' and the conduct of multitudes, who act in direct opposition to the most solemn engagements, entered into for themselves or others, will render their doom more dreadful at the last day, than that of Jews, Mahometans, Pagans, or avowed infidels.

The Lord's supper also calls for our peculiar attention, as it is of the greatest importance in the system of Christianity. When baptized persons give hopeful evidence, that they are partakers of 'the inward and spiritual grace, of the initiatory ordinance; they should be exhorted to make, or renew, a personal profession of their faith in Christ, their cordial acceptance of his salvation, and their purpose of living according to his commandments, by joining with his people in receiving the Lord's Supper: for this seems to be the Scriptural way of making such a profession, whatever expediency there may be in other introductory observances.

Nothing can be more simple in its own nature than this institution; though superstition has been peculiarly successful in misrepresenting, obscuring, and perverting it. Our blessed Saviour, the evening before his crucifixion, having celebrated the passover with his disciples, appointed the Lord's supper to be a memorial of his redemption, as the paschal lamb had been a prefiguration of it. He therefore took bread, and by prayer, praise, and thanksgiving, set it apart to be the representation of his body. He broke it, to show that his body must be wounded, bruised, put to great torture, and undergo death, for the redemption of his people; and he directed each of his disciples to eat of that bread in remembrance of him, to instruct them in the way by which his atonement would be made effectual to their salvation. In like manner he took the cup, and, renewing his prayers and thanksgivings, he bade them all drink of it; as the wine represented his blood, which was about to be shed to purchase the blessings of the new covenant, and to ratify it in behalf of the whole multitude of believers, for the remission of their sins. The language of Christ in appointing this ordinance, is manifestly figurative, and cannot be literally interpreted, (unless we should explain the material cup itself to be the blood of Christ, or rather, the new covenant;) and this renders it the more wonderful, that any set of men should be so adventurous and absurd, as to require all the church to believe, in contradiction to their senses, that the bread in the sacrament, after consecration, becomes the real entire body of Christ! But, indeed, the Scripture gives us no intimation of any peculiar mystery in this institution; though strong metaphors are employed, the more emphatically to demand our attention to the importance of the thing signified by the outward emblems*.

From these Scriptures, I apprehend, we may learn in general, that our Lord commanded all his disciples, in every age, to the end of the world, frequently to meet together in his name, and with solemn worship suitable to the occasion, to break, distribute, and eat bread, the most salutary and universal of all viands, and to pour out and drink wine, the most valuable and refreshing of all cordials. This action was intended to be a perpetual memorial of Christ, especially of his body broken, and of his blood shed, for their sins. The body, (for that alone could be represented by an outward emblem,) was doubtless put for his perfect and entire human nature, as personally united to the eternal Word and Son of God. His blood, (the shedding of which was the evident and immediate cause of his death,) denoted the whole of his expiatory sufferings, which terminated when he expired on the cross. The dignity, righteousness, and holiness of the Redeemer; the depth of his voluntary humiliation and the intenseness of his agonies; the vastness of his condescension and compassionate love; the deplorable state of deserved misery from which he redeemed sinners; the extensive efficacy of his one oblation; the honour and happiness to which he exalts all true believers ; and the discovery made in this great transaction, of the justice and love of God, the excellency of his law, the evil of sin, the vanity of the world, and the importance of eternal things, should all be taken into the account, when we contemplate the death of Christ through the medium of these outward emblems ; whilst the action, of eating the bread and drinking the wine, illustrates the manner in which the sacrifice of Christ becomes effectual ; by even ‘ feeding on him, in our hearts, by faith with thanksgiving,’ (John vi. 53—58.) The Lord’s supper was instituted in the evening, and probably the disciples received it sitting ; but as no command was given in this respect, it may well be considered as a matter of indifference, in which the validity of the ordinance is not at all concerned.

The very act of receiving the Lord’s supper, implies a confession of our guilt and ruined condition, from which we could not have been saved, if Jesus had not died upon the cross to redeem us ; a profession that we entirely believe the testimony of God, respecting the person, undertaking, and atonement of Christ, and the reality, sufficiency, and efficacy of his vicarious sufferings ; an avowed dependence on the mercy and grace of God, according to the promises and provision of the new covenant, which was ratified by Emmanuel’s blood ; an acknowledgment of our obligations to this most gracious Benefactor, and an expression of our love and gratitude to him ; a sacramental engagement to obey him as our Lord and Saviour, surrendering ourselves to him, as “ bought with a price, to glorify him with our bodies and spirits, which are his ;” and a public uniting of ourselves to his redeemed people, to walk with them in Christian love and fellowship, in all the ordinances of divine worship, and in all holy conversation and godliness.

It is, therefore, most evident, that no man is prepared for this sacred ordinance, or capable of sincerely and intelligently making that profession which is implied in it ; unless he be indeed a self-condemned penitent ; who really believes the gospel, and renounces all other confidences to "flee for refuge to lay hold on the hope set before him;" and unless, in his most secret retirement, he endeavours to receive Christ Jesus the Lord, as his Prophet, Priest, Ruler, and Saviour, purposing thenceforth to walk in obedience to him. The man, who habitually allows himself in known sin, or the neglect of known duty; who harbours pride, envy, malice, avarice, or sensual lusts in his heart; who comes to the sacrament to compensate for his sins, or to cloak his secret transgressions; who attends on it to quiet conscience by a self-righteous service, substituting the outward sign for the thing signified; or who uses it as a mere step to secular preferment, must "be guilty of the body and blood of Christ," and eat and drink his own condemnation. But the humble, trembling penitent, who would apply for salvation through the crucified Saviour, by using the means that he hath appointed, ought not to suspect any snare, or fear any danger in approaching the Lord's table; even though many doubts may still disquiet his mind, or great remaining darkness obscure his views.

When the Corinthians had most grievously profaned this ordinance, and exposed themselves to severe rebukes and corrections, the Apostle did not counsel them to seek for security by absenting themselves from it; and though they might doubtless profitably use the advice and assistance of their pastors or brethren, he did not direct them to be satisfied with their decisions; but "to examine themselves, and so eat of that bread, and drink of that cup," (1 Cor. xi. 27—31) It was incumbent on them to examine diligently, whether they were in the faith? Whether they did truly repent and believe the gospel? Whether their profession was sincere, and their motives pure? Whether their hearts and lives were consistent with the holy religion they had embraced? Whether they did cordially accept of the whole salvation of Christ, and yield themselves to his service? And whether they came to the Lord's table, "discerning his body," "remembering his love," and seeking communion with him and his saints?

Such self-examination must always become professed Christians; not in order to find out some excuse for neglecting to obey the dying command of their loving Saviour; but in order to remember him with more fervent affection, and more exalted thanksgivings. It is very useful, when we have the opportunity, to set apart some time previously to the administration of the Lord's supper, thus to re-examine ourselves, to inquire into our progress in vital godliness, and to renew in secret our cordial consent to the new covenant in the blood of Christ. Such a preparation is especially important to the new convert, when, (with the instructions and prayers of ministers and pious friends,) he first approaches to make this profession; and to the backslider, when he is recovered from his wanderings, and desires to renew the solemn transaction. In all cases, self-examination should be considered merely as introductory to the exercise of repentance and faith, the practice of works meet for repentance, and fervent prayers for divine teaching and grace to enable us more profitably to attend on the ordinances of God; for should any one discover, that at present he could not approach the Lord's table in a suitable manner, he ought by no means to rest satisfied with absenting himself; but should rather be more earnest in using every means of becoming an acceptable communicant. The believer, however, who habitually examines himself, and daily exercises repentance and faith, may very properly receive the Lord's supper without any further preparation, when an unexpected opportunity presents itself.

It is evident, both from Scripture and the earliest records of the primitive church, that this ordinance was administered to the professed disciples of Christ in general, on every Lord's day at least. This frequent recollection of that great event, which is the central point of our holy religion, was exceedingly suited to increase humility, hatred, and dread of sin, watchfulness, contempt of the world, faith, hope, love, gratitude, patience, compassion, meekness, fortitude, and all other holy dispositions.—

These are obvious and intelligible advantages of frequent communicating, if it be done in a serious, considerate, and reverential manner; for the Lord's supper as directly tends to strengthen and refresh the believing soul, as the bread and wine do to nourish and invigorate the body. At the same time, due honour is rendered to the Lord, by this repeated profession of our faith and love; the sympathy of pious persons, uniting in so affectionate an ordinance, promotes edification; the great truths of Christianity are thus brought before the minds of increasing numbers; and the presence and blessing of the Lord may confidently be expected, whilst we thus meet in his name, and present our prayers and thanksgivings before him. Indeed, this institution was expressly intended to "show forth the Lord's death till he come;" and this proves that the doctrine of the atonement is the most essential part of Christianity; and an habitual dependence on a crucified Saviour, the grand peculiarity of the Christian character.

The abuses, that have taken place in respect of this ordinance, have at length produced a lamentable neglect of it; to the dishonour of the Redeemer, and the increase of that lukewarmness of which it is a manifest indication. No doubt the pharisaical, hypocritical, avaricious, and profane approaches of numbers to the Lord's table, constitute a most heinous sin, which, unless repented of, will vastly increase their final condemnation. But they who through ignorance, impiety, carelessness, malice, or secret crimes, are unfit for this holy ordinance, are equally unprepared for death and judgment: and when they withdraw, as Christians are about to commemorate their dying Redeemer, they should very seriously recollect that they allow themselves to have no part or lot in the matter. Indeed, they are as incapable of praying acceptably, as of communicating worthily, whilst they live in wilful opposition to the commands of Christ, and in neglect of his great salvation.

Some persons likewise withdraw, apparently, lest they should make too avowed a profession of religion, or bind themselves too closely to a holy life. As if this instance of disobedience would excuse their conformity to the world, and contempt of the favour and authority of their Judge!—Others are harassed with groundless scruples, lest a well meant but unsuitable approach to the Lord's table should exclude them from future pardon: though even the scandalous profanation of the Corinthians was only visited by temporal corrections, "that they might not be condemned with the world." Or they fear, lest some subsequent fall should render their case desperate; when Peter denied Christ, the very night in which he had both celebrated the passover and the Lord's supper, and yet he was graciously restored. Thus the remainder of unbelief induces many who appear to be pious Christians in other respects to hesitate, and often to refuse obedience to this plain command, during their whole lives; whilst others seem afraid of communicating too frequently; or make the languor of their affections a reason for absenting themselves, by which it is exceedingly increased. But let the new convert, who would thrive in his profession, speedily begin to consider this institution, and deliberately prepare for attending on it, as soon as he can do it sincerely: and let the believer gladly embrace every opportunity of communicating; avoid whatever may unfit him for it; and daily remember the vows of God that are upon him to live to him who died for his salvation.

ESSAY XXV.

On the State of separate Spirits; the Resurrection of the Body; Judgment; and Eternity.

IT is the grand design of revealed religion, to draw off our attention and affections from things present and temporal, and to fix them on things future and eternal. Yet, such is the constitution of the universe, and such the plan of the gospel, that the regulation of our pursuits and actions, in subordination to the interests of the unseen state, tends to produce by far the greatest measure of happiness to individuals, and to society, which can possibly be attained in this present life. Whatever conjectures or discoveries the more rational of the heathen had made in this interesting concern, or whatever intimations God had given about it to the ancient church; it may with the strictest propriety be said, that "life and immortality have been brought to light by the gospel." For the New Testament revelation elucidating and confirming that of the Old, has removed all doubt and uncertainty about a future state of existence, except what arises from our want of faith, or acquaintance with the holy Scriptures; it hath given every needful instruction on the important subject; and it hath annexed to it that authority, which is suited to render it influential upon our whole conduct. This decisive and complete information is of the greatest moment: for all error, obscurity, or uncertainty in a matter of such vast importance, must proportionably enfeeble and unsettle the mind; and deduct from the efficacy of those motives, which excite or animate the soul to vigorous exertion, self-denying obedience, patient sufferings, or courageously meeting dangers, in adhering to the truth and will of God amidst the opposition of this evil world. Our concluding Essay, therefore, will contain some thoughts on the intermediate state; the second coming of Christ; the resurrection of the body; and the process, rule, and event, of judgment.

The immortality of the soul is fully established by the uniform testimony of Scripture; which fully declares, not only that it is created capable of endless existence, but also that it is the unalterable purpose of the Creator it should exist to eternity. It is impossible in the nature of things, that this should be proved by any reasonings or arguments whatever; because the intention of God can be known by express revelation alone.

The language of holy writ constantly implies, that the soul is capable of exerting its powers and faculties, in a state of separation from the body. The Apostle could not tell "whether," during his vision, "he were in the body, or out of the body;" (2 Cor. xii. 1—3.) and he spoke of being "absent from the body and present with the Lord." (2 Cor. v. 8) We frequently read of "the things done in the body;" which implies that the same agent is capable of doing things out of the body. "Our earthly house of this tabernacle must be dissolved, that we may have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." (2 Cor. v. 1.) "Then the body shall return to the dust, and the spirit to God:" (Eccles. xii. 7.) Accordingly we read of "the spirits of just men made perfect," as well as of "an innumerable company of angels*:" and even these brief hints may suffice to show, that the system of modern materialists cannot be supported. (any more than the other doctrines of the same school,) except by rejecting the word of God, and treating the sacred writers as men who espoused and propagated vulgar errors, whilst they professed to "speak as they were moved by the Holy Ghost."

The Scriptures likewise teach us, that both the righteous and the wicked, immediately on leaving the body, enter on a state of happiness or misery. Lazarus was carried, as soon as he died, into Abraham's bosom; and when "the rich man died and was buried, in hell he lifted up his eyes, being in torments;" whilst his brethren, in his father's house, were following him to the same state of misery. Should it be urged, that this is a parabolical representation, we answer, that He who is the TRUTH itself would never have spoken those things, even in a parable, which have a direct tendency to mislead the reader, and to raise an expectation of a state which has no existence. But, indeed, our Lord was pleased to confirm this inference by his address from the cross to the dying thief, "This day shalt thou be with me in paradise;" (Luke xvi. 22—31. xxiii. 43.) which could not have been the case, unless his soul had existed in a state of happiness, whilst his body lay buried with that of the other malefactor. They, therefore, who deny this distinction between soul and body, must suppose our Lord, as well as his Apostles, to have been mistaken.—His answer likewise to the Sadducees, who cavilled about the doctrine of the resurrection, is equally decisive against those who deny the intermediate state; for “as God is not the God of the dead, but of the living,” how can he be the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, if they have been wholly dead during so many revolving centuries? (Matt. 22—32.)

The Apostle “had a desire to depart and to be with Christ, as far better,” than living on earth; but he would not have been any sooner with Christ for departing hence, if he were to lie entirely under the power of death, until the resurrection; nor could he “be present with the Lord, when absent from the body,” if never made capable of beholding him till his second coming. (2 Cor. v. 8.) The souls of those, to whom Christ, by his Spirit in Noah, preached, during the term of God’s long-suffering while the ark was preparing, are represented as being in prison at the time when Peter wrote; (1 Pet. iii. 19, 20.) and John was directed to write, “blessed are the dead, which die in the Lord, from henceforth, even so saith the Spirit.” (Rev. xiv. 13.) Yea, he saw an innumerable company before the throne, who were crying for vengeance on their persecutors; but were required to wait till the rest of their brethren had finished their testimony; which, however interpreted, must precede the resurrection of the dead. (Rev. vi. 9—11.) And here it may be proper to repeat the observation, that the God of truth and love would not arrange even the circumstances of a vision in such a manner, as directly tended in the most obvious interpretation to mislead men in so material a point. These are a specimen of those scriptural arguments, by which we are induced to expect an immediate entrance into happiness or misery, as soon as we leave this world, by an anticipation of that sentence which will be publicly pronounced at the day of judgment.

Various absurd notions, and curious speculations, have been formed about this intermediate state; which the use of the word translated Hell, for the place of separate spirits, may have in part occasioned. Thus the Messiah, by the royal prophet, expressed his confidence in the Father, “that he would not leave his soul in hell, neither suffer his Holy One to see corruption.” (Psal. xvi. 10. Acts ii. 27—31.) Many learned men, indeed, would explain both these expressions to denote the grave, by a very unnatural tautology; but scarcely any thing can be more evident, than that by Hell is meant the place of separate spirits, to which the human soul of Christ repaired, as soon as his body was laid in the grave, till their re-union at his glorious resurrection.

The Scripture seems in general only to inform us that the souls of the righteous, when their earthly tabernacle is taken down, are made perfect in knowledge, purity, and love; being freed from all remains of sin, removed from every temptation, made conquerors over all their enemies, exempted from all labours, sorrows, fears, and distresses, and admitted into the presence of Christ, to behold his glory, and enjoy his love; that they are qualified to join the rapturous worship of angels, and to share their felicity in the full completion of all their spiritual desires, in communion with God, and in the society of holy beings; that their joys far exceed all that they could on earth conceive or imagine, and are fully adequate to their most enlarged capacities, though proportioned to the degree of their grace and fruitfulness on earth; that nothing is wanting to the absolute completion of their happiness, but that re-union with their bodies, for which they wait in joyful hope, assured that then “mortality shall be swallowed up of life;” and that with adoring acclamations, they witness the Redeemer’s triumphs on earth, and the accomplishment of those prophecies, for which they fervently prayed whilst here they fought the good fight of faith. On the other hand, it is manifest from the sacred oracles, that the souls of the wicked, when they leave the body, “are driven away in their wickedness," under condemnation and the wrath of God, and under the power of their vile affections, now freed from all restraint; and that thus they immediately sink into a state of despair, and punishment proportioned to their crimes; in which they will continue till the day of judgment, in dire expectation of that event to complete their misery, by re-uniting them to their bodies, the instruments of their crimes, and sharers with their souls in the righteous vengeance of their offended Creator.

After the souls of successive generations shall have been thus gathered to their own company, and their bodies shall have returned to the ground whence they were taken, the end will at length arrive; when "the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty Angels, in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ; who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power; when he shall come to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired in all them that believe." (2 Thess. i. 7—10.) The divine Saviour will then personally appear in the clouds, even as the Apostles beheld him when he ascended into heaven. (Acts i. 11.) "For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the Archangel, and with the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first." (1 Thess. iv. 15—17.) This will be accompanied by the change of all such believers as shall then be found alive upon the earth. (1 Cor. xv. 51, 52.) The resurrection of all others, who shall have died from the creation of the world to this grand consummation of all things, will afterwards take place: and then the earth and all its works will be burnt up by one general conflagration. No words, however, can possibly explain, illustrate, or enable the reader to frame any adequate conception of this majestic, tremendous, yet most delightful scene, or the different emotions of the righteous and the wicked during this astonishing catastrophe. What a spectacle of grandeur and horror would the conflagration of one large city present, were it all at once in flames! What then will be the prospect exhibited to the innumerable spectators, when "the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat; the earth also and all the works that are therein shall be burnt up." (2 Pet. iii. 10—13.) When universal nature shall, as it were, expire in convulsions! when the haughtiest rebels shall call in vain for rocks and mountains to fall on them, and hide them from the face of their offended Judge! and when all possibility of escape or mercy, shall vanish for ever!

"The hour is then coming, in which all that are in the graves shall hear the voice of Christ, and shall come forth; they that have done good to the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil to the resurrection of damnation." (John v. 28, 29) "The multitudes that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt:" (Dan. xii. 2.) and "there shall be a resurrection both of the just and of the unjust." As the body is a part of our nature, and the instrument of the soul in doing good or evil; so it is meet that it should be raised from the dead, to share the happiness or misery, which shall be awarded to every one according to his works, by the righteous Judge of the world. Little, however, is spoken in Scripture concerning the resurrection of the wicked, compared with the copious information there afforded concerning that of the righteous. By the omnipotent word of Him, "who is the Resurrection and the Life," the bodies of his redeemed people shall first be raised from the dust of the earth, from the depths of the sea, and from every place in which they have been deposited; and being restored to life, incorruptible, immortal, and glorious, they will be re-united to their immortal souls, to participate and increase their unspeakable felicity. For "the Lord Jesus shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body, according to the working whereby he is able even to subdue all things to himself." (Phil. iii. 20, 21.)

We know what appellation the Apostle bestowed on those, who, cavilling at his doctrine, inquired "how are the dead raised? and with what bodies do they come?" Questions about identity, and difficulties started about the possibility of a resurrection, may answer the purposes of a proud sceptical philosophy: but the humble disciple, sitting as a little child at the Saviour's feet will allow, "that such knowledge is too high for him, he cannot attain unto it;" and perceive that it is meet to answer all such objections by saying, "hath God spoken, and shall he not do it;" "Can any thing be too hard for the Lord?" We are sure that our bodies will be so far raised the same, that we shall know ourselves to be the same persons, who did such and such things on earth: but "as we must all be changed," our bodies will not be in every respect the same. "There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body;" the "image of the first, and of the second Adam;" "and as we have borne the image of the earthly, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly:" "that which is sown in corruption, dishonour, and weakness, shall be raised in incorruption, glory, and power." "Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God;" but he will give every one his own body, even as he gives to every seed an increase of the same kind that was sown. (1 Cor. xv.) When we reflect on the resplendent appearance of Christ on the mount of transfiguration; and further recollect, that the beloved disciple, who leaned on his breast at table, fell at his feet as dead when he appeared to him in glory; we shall find our views enlarged, and expect to receive a body at the resurrection beyond expression glorious and beautiful, and as much superior to these bodies of our humiliation as the heavens are above the earth. They will be liable to none of the wants, decays, disorders, or grossness, of our present animal frame: no longer will they retard our motions, or impede us in contemplation and devotion: but they will be suited to assist and increase the most sublime and rapturous joys of our immortal souls to all eternity.

And, however it may appear to us at present, we shall doubtless find the resurrection of our bodies to be an immense accession to our happiness, and to our capacity of enjoying and glorifying God.

Whilst the Scripture states the order of the resurrection, and intimates that the final justification of believers shall precede the resurrection of the wicked, that they may be assessors with Christ in judging men and angels; (1 Cor. vi. 2, 3.) it also speaks more fully on the grounds of their admission to the glorious inheritance prepared for them, in language which implies that the whole assembled world shall be made acquainted with them. Nothing can be more august than the description given of this tremendous day of God. The Apostle in vision, "saw a great white throne, and Him that sat thereon, from whose face the heaven and the earth fled away, and there was no place left for them." (Rev. xx. 11—15.) No words can more emphatically declare the sovereign authority, and the infinite power, justice, and holiness, of the Judge. "He saw the dead also, both small and great, stand before God; and the books were opened." This declares the discoveries that will be made, when omniscience shall "bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and make manifest the counsels of all hearts;" (Cor. iv. 1—3.) the perfect recollection, and full conviction, which every one will then have of all his thoughts, words, actions, motives, and intentions, however they had previously been mistaken or forgotten; the judgment to be made of the whole by the perfect rule of the divine command; and the final condemnation of all, "whose names are not found written in the book of life." This likewise implies, that none can abide the severity of that impartial judgment, except those who are interested in the new covenant mediated by the Son of God: whilst we are taught, by "death and hell being cast into the lake of fire, that all the saints will be finally delivered from death, suffering, and every consequence of sin which will from that period be wholly destroyed, or rather confined to those who perish in their sins.

The Apostle Paul declares that "we must all appear," or be made manifest in our true character, "before the judgment seat of Christ; that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad." (2 Cor. v. 10.) The same interesting truth is exhibited under various parables or similitudes; "Every tree, that bringeth not forth good fruit, shall be hewn down and cast into the fire," the tares shall be separated from the wheat; the corn from the chaff; and the man without the wedding garment from the welcome guests. "At the end of the world, the Angels shall come forth, and sever the wicked from among the just, and shall cast them into the furnace of fire; there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth." (Mat. xiii 41—43. 49, 50) Indeed, all the descriptions, which are given us of this grand event, relate especially to the case of those who have the benefit of revelation: but we are expressly told that "When the Son of Man shall come in his glory, and all the holy Angels with him: then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory; and before him shall be gathered all nations, and he shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats." (Mat. xxv. 31—46.) This he will do with perfect ease, certainty, and impartiality: he will pronounce the final sentence with absolute authority, from which there can be no appeal; execute it with a power to which all resistance will be vain; and display the propriety of it so clearly as to silence every objection. These things are suited to give us the most exalted apprehensions of the Judge himself, who "shall come in his own glory," as mediator, "and in the glory of the Father," exercising all divine perfections through the medium of the human nature; so that this will be "the appearing of the glory of the great God, and our Saviour Jesus Christ." (Tit. ii. 13.) Then "every eye shall see him, and they also which pierced him, and all the kindreds of the earth shall wail because of him. Even so, Amen." (Rev. i. 7. Jude, 14, 15.)

But when "the books shall be opened," it will appear that many of those who had been guilty of numerous and heinous crimes, during a great part of their lives, had at length truly repented, and believed in Christ with a living faith ; “ being ” then “ justified by faith, they had peace with God : ” “ their sins were cast into the depths of the sea, ” “ never more to be mentioned against them. ” (Ezek. xviii. 22. Micah vii. 19.) Their repentance having been evidenced by newness of life ; their faith having worked by love to Christ, his cause, and his people ; and the Spirit of adoption having sealed them by his sanctifying influences ; a new character was formed in them, and their subsequent good works will evince their union with Christ, show their title to the eternal inheritance, and constitute the measure by which their gracious recompense shall be ascertained. For, all their former sins having been blotted out ; and all the defects, defilements, and failures of their subsequent obedience repented of, and washed away through the daily exercise of faith in Christ, nothing will be found written concerning them, but the account of the good works which they did from evangelical principles, and by the grace of the Holy Spirit ; whether they have been spared to produce these good fruits, for a longer or a shorter time. Then all their conscientious self denial, their secret piety and charity, their heavenly meditations and affections, their pure disinterested motives ; their edifying converse ; their zeal, gratitude, self-abasement, godly sorrow, patience, meekness, perseverance in doing good against evil, constancy in the midst of opposition ; with all they have renounced, ventured, laboured, or suffered for Christ’s sake, will be brought to light and made manifest before men and Angels. Every calumny and malicious charge of hypocrisy, affectation, or spiritual pride, will be refuted ; their whole conduct will appear in its true light, and it will be undeniably manifest, that they were the upright worshippers and servants of God, the disciples and friends of Christ, and decidedly on his part in this evil world. Then it will be seen, that it “ is a righteous thing with God to recompense ” with his heavenly rest, those, who willingly endure

ed tribulations for his sake, whilst they lived among his enemies; (2 Thess. i. 4—12) and no one shall be able to object to the decision of the Judge, when he shall say, "Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the beginning of the world."

On the other hand, many who call Christ Lord, Lord, will be exposed as hypocrites, and workers of iniquity; (Matt. vii. 22, 23. xxv. 1—11. Luke xiii. 25—28.) for it will then be proved that their profession or preaching of the gospel, attendance on ordinances and outward services, sprang from corrupt and selfish motives; that their transient convictions and affections never issued in an inward change; that they secretly "loved the wages of unrighteousness," or the pleasures of sin; that they were the slaves of avarice, ambition, sensuality, or malignant passions; that they did all their works to be seen of men, and were strangers to constant, fervent, secret religion; that they did not love Christ and his cause, but were deceived by a dead faith, a presumptuous hope, and a false repentance; and that they were not interested in the new covenant, but remained under the curse of the law, with the aggravation of having also abused and disgraced the gospel. This will be the case, not only with those who have secretly committed gross immoralities, and cloaked them with a religious profession; but with all who have not shown their love to Christ, by a disposition to love and do good to his people for his sake, and whatever they may now urge in excuse for their conduct, they will be silenced at last, and with all other unbelievers be doomed, "to depart accursed into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels."

The several scriptural representations of this decisive event concur in establishing these conclusions. "They who sin without law, shall perish without law;" they that transgress the law, (having had the benefit of revelation,) will be judged and condemned according to it; but if they claim the benefit of the gospel, their professed faith in Christ will be tried by its fruits and effects; so that none will eventually stand in judgment, except the true believer, who hath shown his faith by his works. Yet the doom of benighted heathens, however vile their conduct hath been, will be far less dreadful than that of wicked Christians; and hypocritical professors of the gospel will not only be more severely punished than the inhabitants of Tyre and Sidon, but it will even be more tolerable for Sodom than for them.

Let it be here carefully observed, that very dangerous conclusions have been drawn from our Lord's words respecting the day of judgment: (Matt. xxv. 35—40.) as if humane and beneficent actions of any kind would ensure a man's acceptance at that solemn season. But every reflecting person on deliberately examining the passage must perceive, that nothing will then be favourably noticed, which has been done by impenitent despisers of the gospel, from ostentation, or pharisaical pride, or a mere instinctive propensity; for this supposition contradicts and disannuls the whole system of Christianity.—In fact, kindness to believers, the brethren of Christ, from love to his name, truth, cause, and image, as the genuine effect of living faith, is exclusively mentioned in this description. No doubt, however, but love to our fellow-sinners and enemies, from evangelical motives, will be graciously accepted: but active, liberal love to true Christians, whom we are naturally disposed to scorn and hate, is selected, as the most unequivocal proof of our love to Christ; nor can this ever be separated from other instances of humble obedience, in the habitual tenour of our conduct.

It may easily be conceived what discoveries will be made, "when the books shall be opened," in respect of the different descriptions of unbelievers; which will suffice to "stop every mouth," to bring in "the whole world as guilty before God;" and to illustrate the divine justice in the condemnation of all those, who shall then "go away into everlasting punishment." Every one, who seriously reflects on his own conduct, during the en-ture course of his past life ; and compares his thoughts, words, and works, with the holy commandments of God, will gradually more and more find his own heart condemn him : and if this be the case with the most moral of the human race, where will the blasphemous, the profligate, the fraudulent, the oppressor, and the murderer appear ? Whatever may now be objected, or whatever excused, the discovery of the divine glory of the holy and perfect law, of man's obligations, and of the whole behaviour of every individual, towards God and man, will then leave the most specious unbelievers speechless, and make them feel the justice of their own condemnation.

But what words can express the consequence of this definitive sentence ? Or who does not see that the language of Scripture is selected to mark out the most tremendous effects of almighty indignation ? “ These shall go away into everlasting,” (or eternal), “ punishment.” But how can this be, if the persons thus condemned do not exist for ever in a state of punishment ? Or what proof have we of the eternity of happiness intended for the righteous, if the same word in the same verse in one place do not mean eternal ?—We need not enlarge.—If the ideas “ of a never dying worm, an extinguishable fire,” “ the blackness of darkness for ever,” and “ the company of the devil and his angels,” do not “ warn men to flee from the wrath to come,” none else can, for these only fail, because they are not believed.”

On the other hand, “ a kingdom that cannot be moved,” an incorruptible, undefiled, and unfading inheritance,” “ an exceeding and eternal weight of glory,” “ pleasures at God's right hand for evermore,” are expressions so energetic, that did we truly believe and attend to them, we could not but be influenced by them in all our conduct. Here then we pause—“ Beloved, we know not what we shall be ; but this we know, that when Jesus shall appear, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is ;” and the countless ages of eternity will only serve to enhance our unutterable joys. With what words, then, can we more properly close this Essay, and the present compendious publication, than those of the Apostle? "Wherefore, beloved, seeing that ye look for such things, be diligent, that ye may be found of him in peace, without spot, and blameless."
